PASSING COMMENT

A group of us were sitting about the luncheon table at Northfield last week and the talk drifted to funny experiences of the studio.

The organist told this: "I play, as you know, in an Episcopal church which is very 'high,' as well as thoroughly exclusive. A young tenor, who, as you will guess, knew little of churches, was engaged to sing a solo for a special occasion in the church and came to my studio to rehearse his number. 'Will you have it with sobs or without,' he asked me, in the most matter-of-fact way. Of course I told him that we were not putting on a performance of 'Pagliacci,' but even at that he could see nothing so out of place in his question."

Said the piano teacher: "I can beat that, I think. Some months ago a young woman came into my studio and said she wanted to study with me. I asked her to play something. 'Shall I play it with expression,' she asked, 'or without'? 'With as much expression as possible,' I told her. She began to play, and at the first note put down the damper pedal and did not release it once until, unable to stand it longer, I demanded, 'Why do you keep the pedal down all the time'? 'Well,' she replied, in a hurt voice, 'you said that I was to play with expression.'"

"That is pretty good, but I can go you one better," said another piano teacher present. "A few days ago a girl came to my studio to play for me, and the result was so weird that I fairly writhed in pain. 'What kind of music do you call that?' I asked. 'Well,' she replied, 'perhaps the reason it sounds so funny to you is because it is written in seven sharps, but my teacher has only taught me as far as four, and I do not know how to play any more than that.'"

"You win!" agreed the other two.

There has been much talk recently about temperamental artists and the display of the prima donna manner in players and singers, but to me it seems that the most temperamental of all people connected in any way with music are the managers.

Recently a representative of this paper asked a manager in one of the smaller cities to advertise her attractions in Music News. She was very positive in her refusal, stating, without equivocation, that she did not like the editor of this paper.

When pressed for a reason, she finally said that once he had written his opinion that a certain Mr. A was a better symphony conductor than a certain Mr. B, and that, as she did not agree with him at all, she would have nothing to do with his paper.

Imagine a real business man or business woman giving so puerile a reason for the withholding of business.

Supposing a retailer should say to a commercial traveler, "I will not buy anything at all from your house, because it is situated on the south side of a street, and I myself prefer stores to be situated on the north side."

Isn't one of these statements just as logical as the other?

At one of the commencement concerts of last week a woman just back of me said, "I love the Mozart and Beethoven concertos, but I don't care at all for the MacDowell."

"There," said my friend, who is inclined to conservatism, "that is proof enough that it is foolish to try to use so much American music."

"Nothing of the sort," said I. "It is simply proof of the fact that MacDowell has not yet been used enough to make it thoroughly familiar, and, beyond question, the thing to do now is to use MacDowell and other American composers over and over again, and to study them so thoroughly and to play them so well that gradually the public will be weaned away from their great love for other things. Not American music exclusively, by any means, but American music so much and so constantly as to make it a household word and, eventually, a household favorite."

King Hassan, well-beloved, was wont to say,
When aught went wrong, or any labor failed,
"Tomorrow, friends, will be another day!"
And in that faith he slept, and so prevailed.

The plan of having a choir of men and women in Episcopal service, although not absolutely unknown in Chicago, is still very much a matter of experiment, and therefore the success of Emory Gallup in his work at St. Chrysostom's is all the more notable.

For several years he has used the boy choir only on occasion, depending mostly upon his group of men and women for the singing, and the result has been satisfactory in the extreme.

On last Sunday morning these singers were heard in "The Heavens Declare" (Beethoven), and the body of tone, the musical intelligence and the technical accuracy and brilliance in evidence were so marked as to prove Mr. Gallup a fine choirmaster and musician, and also bespoke the utmost of devotion on the part of his choir.

Vera Brady Shipman, formerly a well-known teacher, and later a manager in Chicago, but a resident of Salina, Kan., for the past year, has been a visitor in this city the past week.

Vilim—Joseph Vilim, a long-time teacher and violin artist of Chicago, has removed to Coronado, Calif., his address being 820 Avenue F. Mr. Vilim is author of "Violin Technique Guide" and "Seven Days' Exercises," two very popular pedagogical works.

Lulek—Dr. Fery Lulek, who has been at the head of the vocal department of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music for seven years but who will in September remove to New York and there open vocal studios, will be under the concert direction of Winton & Livingston.

"Do re mi" Theory Exploded

By EFFA ELLIS PERFIELD

(All rights reserved)

Using the "sol fa" syllables is unpedagogical. Such use violates a fundamental principle of education. It is equivalent to teaching one thing in order to teach another. This is bad pedagogy.

The syllable names are meant to be guides or aids. A guide, in order to be of service, must be a stepping stone and assistance to the thing that is to be developed.

A guide must not be more difficult to learn, or be brought more to the foreground, than the thing it is to lead up to and aid in establishing. One thing should not be used as a guide in developing another unless the thing so used is itself of value. Two or more distinct things may be taught at the same time, each reacting and re-enforcing the other. For instance, note values may be taught in connection with rhythm, balance, phrasing, sequence, melodic progressions and tonality. Each of the above may be emphasized and strengthened because of its association with one or more of the others. But in the case of the "sol fa" syllables, as a means of singing the tones which they name, we find them difficult and burdensome to apply.

The "sol fa" syllables are articulate sounds. Tones are inarticulate sounds. To use an articulate sound for the sake of expressing or recognizing an inarticulate sound is to master a more difficult sound in order to express the simplest of all sounds—tones. Furthermore, the "sol fa" syllables have no value for themselves alone. At best they are only means to an end. None of the most ardent advocates of the use of the "sol fa" syllables claims more than this for them—"means to an end." Here is an instance in which the "means" do not work toward the "end," but actually and positively thwart that end—facile and free expression. How can conscious thinking in articulate names simplify and facilitate natural and free expression in inarticulate sounds?

We ask the skilled singer of "do re mi" to test the following exercises, then tell us which is the easier to sing, the bugle tones with or without the syllables.

Exercise: Sing "loo" to any lively bugle call you may know or improvise. Repeat and apply the "do mi sol" correctly to the same tones. What is the result? The mind and tongue did not respond rapidly enough to connect the syllables with the tones. The bugle with its flowing chord tones is easily sung. More feeling can be expressed without the syllables because only tone is heard —there are no syllables to occupy the mind and detract from the music. Really and earnestly we must say with all the sincerity we can command that it is incumbent upon the advocate of the "sol fa" system to answer and refute this use of the articulate and conscious in facilitating the inarticulate subconscious expression.

Often the principle of the articulate sounds, "sol fa" syllables, is used when the names are not used at all. This is possible even though the singer did not know the "sol fa" syllables and how to apply them. This is the case in all instances where the beginner's training is based on tones considered as interval distances, and as individual problems that must be mastered through, or by reason of, the beginner's ability to recall the successive tones of a melody as tones of the scale previously memorized. In instances of this kind the mental effort and the quality of effort are the same, or practically the same, as though the syllable names were used. Consequently to merely eliminate the "sol fa" syllables and still rely on the scale and interval system does not bring us into the feeling for tones as they lie in melody and harmony, and without this feeling there can be no real musical stimulus, and without musical stimulus there can be no natural and accurate recalling of tones. The basis of all correct singing, either sight singing, singing from memory, or singing by imitation, or part singing is the feeling for a progression of tones growing out of the fundamental tone of the chords. All musical capacity is based on this fundamental feeling.

The individual experienced in the feeling for tones in chords and in the feeling for chord progressions is equipped to master any problem of pitch relations and to master it musically. Thus equipped, in singing the tones of the melody, each succeeding tone is sure to come into the mind as the result of the stimulus of the tones already sung. The two distinct elements of stimulus for singing tones of a melody are: key feeling through chords, and feeling for the tonal order of the particular composition.

Is it not apparent that training the immature mind to think of a tone through associating it with an individual name trains the beginner to depend upon the name association as a mental suggestion rather than upon the musical factors of chord feeling and melody feeling? In one case the association is purely mental, to develop later into musical feeling—a dual and indirect process. In the other case the association is entirely musical from the beginning—a single process of feeling—direct, immediate and responsive.

Why use "do re mi" names for a thing which the singer can best learn and do by the true feeling of tones? Would it not seem that it is only cumbering and overburdening the student with methods and processes which have no value of themselves —which make simple processes difficult and which, if used after these processes are fully established, only add elaboration and additional material to processes which are more simple without?

Why master the simple through the complex?

Why reach the obvious through the complicated?

Why reach the immediate through the remote?

Why use the obscure for the distinct?

Why use the unpleasant for the agreeable?

Why reach the harmonious through the inharmonious?

Using syllable names is unpedagogical. It is unpedagogical because—

The guide is more burdensome than the thing it teaches.

The guide requires more thought than the thing it teaches;

The guide itself is of no value.

The guide is not fundamental because it is not final.

The guide is based on reasoning instead of feeling.

The guide is uninteresting.

The guide lacks clearness and is too easily misused.

The guide lacks definiteness.

The guide is insecure.

The guide requires too much drill.

Instead of learning to sing names for music, let us spend our time singing music. Let us eliminate in the beginning all that must be thrown aside at the end. All music study should begin and end with music.

PUPILS OF FRANK OLIN THOMPSON WIN SIGNAL SUCCESS

The commencement exercises of the Wisconsin Conservatory, Milwaukee, held on June 21 at St. John's Auditorium, presented a very good program throughout. Two pupils of Frank Olin Thompson, assistant director, Dorothy Jensen playing Concerto for Piano in D minor, First Movement (Rubinstein) and Helen Irene Roberts in the First Movement of the Grieg A minor Concerto for Piano, scoring notably for themselves and their teacher. Both are post-graduates and their work bore the hallmark of the full-fledged artist. Not a mere "getting away" with something but a finished, artistic performance; and it would not have been difficult to believe the player of the Grieg Concerto was of more experience than one credits to a post-graduate. Subtle insight and facile technic helped to make it a real interpretation. Emily Silber, pupil of Rose Phillips, who did so splendidly in her recent recital, duplicated her success on this program in the First Movement of Saint-Saens' G minor Concerto and Miss Genevieve Pierce of the violin faculty added variety and charm with two movements from Veiuxtemps' Fourth Concerto for violin.

ADDISON BRISCOE PRESENTS PUPILS

Addison Briscoe presented the younger members of his piano class in recital Sunday afternoon, June 29th, at the Metropolitan Conservatory, Kimball Hall.

A large audience was present and expressed much pleasure with the program.

The pupils presented were Burton Wolff, Milton Wohl, Harold Adler, Harold Strauss, Florence Eggert, Wilmur Randeck, Beatrice Krulewich and Elinor Costello.

Mrs. Lillian Thomas Johnston, soprano, sang a group of songs charmingly. Mr. Briscoe accompanied and also rendered a brilliant piano number.

An excellent Irish reading by Elinor Costello and violin numbers by William Wasserman lent further variety to the program.

AUDITORIUM CONSERVATORY

Of the long list of spring recitals none are more interesting than those presented by the Stein students at the Auditorium Conservatory. Last Thursday evening a good audience greeted the students in the Auditorium Recital Hall and were rewarded by a varied program of music and dramatic numbers, presented with their customary life and merit. Mr. Stein is an advocate of American music, judging by the list of composers and the thoughtful interpretations offered by his well-trained singers.

The piano numbers by pupils of Stephen Erst were given with evidence of good academic training and an appreciation of the inner meaning of the music, especially the numbers by Weber and Dohnanyi.

The three dramatic readers for which Mrs. Stein was responsible gave evidence of the most careful intellectual and emotional development. A splendid climax was given to the program by the scene from "Within the Law," recalling Margaret Illington's impersonation of several years ago.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE NOTES

The most numerously attended summer session in the history of the Chicago Musical College opened last Monday. From early morning until late in the evening the reception hall of the institution was packed with students who have come to the college from every part of the country. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed among those who are enrolled in the classes of Professor Auer, Percy Grainger, Oscar Saenger, Herbert Witherspoon, Clarence Eddy, and in those of the resident members of the faculty.

One of the most interesting programs of the season will be given by the Chicago Musical College in Ziegfeld Theater, this Saturday at 11 o'clock. In addition to the students of resident members of the faculty, there will be heard students of Professor Auer, Percy Grainger and Herbert Witherspoon.

SAM THOMPSON

On June 29 Sam Thompson, who has been soprano soloist at Trinity Episcopal Church during 1918 and 1919, sang in the last service he will sing in, in that capacity at Trinity Church, as his voice is so rapidly changing that it is thought by all competent judges that he should rest his voice the next few years with a hope of retaining that beautiful quality that this gifted boy has in his voice. If this can be done, the world will have one more noted singer in young Thompson as a man, for as a boy soprano he has been at the top in Chicago. On last Sunday his tones were most beautifully made. In the solo parts given by him he showed the shading and color that only an artist can give. It is with much regret the choir loses this boy as soloist. It was announced by Mr. Hancock that the Haskel gold medal would be given to him for musical efficiency and faithfulness. He will enter a military school and there take up seriously the study of music as well as military and literary lines.

ETHEL JONES

Ethel Jones, the very charming and popular mezzo, gave a delightful program at a musicale at the home of Dr. and Mrs. J. Gordon Wilson on Saturday evening. The occasion was a farewell by the friends of Professors Moulton and Gardener of the Chicago University, who are leaving for research work.

There was most insistent demand for encores and Miss Jones scored a great success.

Miss Jones was soloist at the First Church of Christ, Scientist, during the month of June and won for herself scores of enthusiastic admirers. There was unanimous enthusiasm and appreciation of her very sincere musicianship and thoroughly satisfying singing.

At a very recent program given by Miss Jones for the Kenwood Club her reception became a real ovation as she generously responded to their demands for more. The quality of her voice, which is rare, and the beauty with which she always uses it were much enhanced on this occasion by the very sympathetic and artistic cello accompaniment given her by Elizabeth Olk-Roelk.

AUGUSTA COTTLOW'S NEW YORK RECITALS

Augusta Cottlow, the eminent American pianist, announces two evening recitals in Aeolian Hall for the season 1919-20, one on January 8, the other on March 12. Miss Cottlow is busy preparing two of her unique and interesting programs for these occasions.

JENNETTE LOUDON STUDIOS

Miss Loudon, herself one of the finest of artists, and excelling particularly in the highest grade ensemble playing, yet chooses to specialize in the teaching of children, and so successfully has she done this for some years that today she stands as one of the most admired exponents of this kind of work and her programs are eagerly scanned by all teachers and heard, always, with enthusiasm by her clientele.

On Saturday afternoon the following program was given to a large audience at the Anna Morgan Studios in the Fine Arts Building, and once again was the work found clear, concise and fruitful.

The Original Compositions were exceedingly charming, and the Toy Symphony, often given by the Loudon pupils, again proved a cunning diversion.

The program in full was as follows:

LEVITZKI ENGAGED FOR CENTRAL CONCERT CO.'S CHICAGO SERIES

Mischa Levitzki is the only pianist engaged for the series of concerts to be given in Medinah Temple, Chicago, next winter, under the direction of the Central Concert Company of Detroit. Levitzki will also be heard in recital in Orchestra Hall under Wessels & Voegeli management.

EMILY V. WHITE PUPILS

Wednesday evening, at Hamlin Park, pupils from the class of Emily V. White were heard in a very interesting program of songs, eight pupils taking part. Charles Kizaur, violinist, played a violin selection.

Miss White has some fine voices in her class, and they acquitted themselves with credit. The accompaniments were sympathetically and artistically played by Miss White.

William Cook did well with the aria from "Carmen" and Stuart's "Bandolero." Gertrude Heim showed facility of voice and good training in the arias from "Rigoletto" and "Mignon." Edna Custin used her good voice to good advantage in a song by Denza, and "Trovatore" aria. Mrs. Frederick Wiles won much applause in her singing of "Merrily I Roam" by Schleiffarth. Myrtle Casings, in an aria by Thomas, and Mrs. Oscar Gibson in Sanderson's "Spring Awakening," were thoroughly musical and were well liked. Mrs. Aloys Neveling met the demands of the Wagner aria and won applause.

Many encores were given, and Miss White is at least one teacher who knows how to arrange a program so that much might be accomplished in a short time.

Papert—Frances Papert, contralto, sang at the last musicale of the San Antonio Musical Club, creating a splendid impression.

Adler—Mariam Barber, an artist pupil of Lois Adler, has filled a number of engagements very successfully the past month.

BLANCH BLOOD PUPILS RECITAL

Auditorium Recital Hall held an interested audience on Tuesday evening, when Blanch Blood presented her younger pupils in a long list of good music, the program in full appearing in last week's Music News.

Then she added an interesting feature in the shape of an Ensemble class of more advanced players on piano and strings. It was a hot, muggy night and spelt trouble for those who play violin or cello. For these instruments are hard to tune and they will not stay put when once fixed. For that reason many of Miss Blood's good motives and much of her earnest, devoted work missed its best effect. But a discerning listener could detect a thoroughly high ideal and very honest striving after the real things in music. A chronicler must always use that faculty and pay tribute to labor well performed and ambition which seeks for exalted standards. The ensemble was at its best, and that was quite good indeed, in an adaptation of the orchestral part of the Finale of the G minor concerto of Mendelssohn. Here the players were prompt, full-toned, eager and responsive, and the music went along with a musical swing pleasant to observe. Helen Jones, a young miss of talent and good training, did the solo part, and Grace Grove was that sterling, reliable, sensitive supporter at the second piano that one can feel sure of whenever she is intrusted with anything. She was also at the piano for a group of nice vocal numbers, done with taste and discrimination by Alice Schliesman. A good voice has been well schooled by John Rankel and she has marks of his training in the way she uses it.

An Adagio from a string quartet written by Miss Blood was a feature on the program. It had the excellent qualities of being lyrical and well put together, with themes which admitted of treatment to make them enjoyable.

DR. FERY LULEK, A FAMOUS SINGING ARTIST AND TEACHER

Dr. Fery Lulek's father, a distinguished Councillor, chose, nothwithstanding his son's very pronounced musical gifts, which early presaged a brilliant musical career, what he considered to be a more practical profession for his son, namely, the law. Therefore, after having finished his academic studies, Fery Lulek became a student of law. He was graduated and took his degree in 1899. For the next four years he devoted himself to the practice of his chosen profession, in the character of judge as well as lawyer. In the meantime, however, he had been pursuing his musical studies under the guidance of Professor Kraemer, and later under Professor Gaensbacher and Professor Ress. In 1904, Dr. Lulek went to Paris to take up his studies with Sbriglia—the well-known Italian teacher of de Reszke, Plancon, etc—and since that time he has devoted himself entirely to music, having appeared with flattering success both as a concert and oratorio singer in all the leading cities of France, England, Belgium, Denmark, Austria, and Germany. Dr. Lulek sang before the President of France, and in recognition of his services to the Universite Populaire, was in the same year decorated by the government and made an Officer de l'Academie Francaise. Dr. Lulek came to America to fill a series of concert engagements in the summer of 1912, and was repeatedly heard in Newport, as also in Bar Harbor and Toronto, meeting with immediate, emphatic success. In connection with his pedagogical activities, he continues his concert work, which in his first American Tournee (1913) included prominent solo and orchestral engagements and appearances in the Toronto Festival, and in the New York Metropolitan Opera Concert Series. Dr. Lulek is an artist of superior qualifications. His voice is a sympathetic, smooth and exquisitely cultivated baritone of big power, which he uses with consummate mastery.

In January, 1912, Miss Bertha Baur, Directress of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, met Dr. Lulek in New York and succeeded in engaging him as head of her vocal department. In the meantime his concert engagements have continued with such organizations as the St. Louis and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras, with unvarying success, and moving his audiences to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

His remarkable success in developing voices is endorsed by many leading musicians, composers, directors and singers, including such authorities as Victor Herbert, Dr. Stillman Kelly, Henry Hadley, P. A. Tirindelli, Nahan Franko, John Cort, etc. Over fifty Lulek pupils have been placed as teachers in leading musical institutions throughout the country, others have operatic contracts, while still others are soloists in churches and upon the concert stage.

After seven years of teaching at the conservatory in Cincinnati, Dr. Lulek moves to New York City, where he will open his magnificent studios, Central Park West, September 10, 1919.

BALATKA ACADEMY OF MUSICAL ART COMMENCEMENT

There was a big audience at Central Music Hall on last Saturday evening—many flowers and much enthusiasm for the students of the Balatka Academy (Anna Balatka, director) who gave the very interesting program, and also for the large number who appeared on the stage to receive certificates, diplomas and other honors.

The program opened with the Heller Tarantelle, played in duet form by Eleanor Roe and Lillian Kaplan, and thereafter the piano numbers included the Concertos C Major (Mozart), and F Sharp (Heller), the Concertstuck of Weber and that of Chaminade, the "Polish Fantasie" (Paderewski), and an original composition by Winne Mae Hornbeck, one of the post graduates of the year.

Ruth Grossman played the Mozart and Belle Goldstein the Heller, the choice being well made and the contrast afforded being a good one.

The Weber was well played by Cora Kloosterman, and the Chaminade was given a really brilliant reading by Miss Hornbeck.

Undoubtedly, however, the most talented pupil of the program was Erhardt Bergstrasser, who played the Paderewski piece with great sweep and style, marring it, however, by the use of notes which made his playing somewhat disjointed and gave the impression of lack of preparation.

KURT DONATH

The violin class of the school did thoroughly good work in the "Euryanthe" Overture (Weber) and the Finale from a Haydn Quartet, and Gladys Leytze, an attractive young soloist, played the brilliant "Hajra Kati" (Hubay).

ANNA BALATKA

Eda Garver sang the Herbert "Gypsy Song" with good style, and Ellen Coste showed herself the possessor of a very good voice in the "Vilanelle" of Del Acqua.

Splendid accompaniments were furnished by Miss Balatka and Miss Hornbeck.

The second part of the program was devoted to an operatic performance under the skillful direction of Kurt Donath, head of the vocal department of the school.

Two acts of "The Legend of the Freeshooter" (Weber) were given, and the entire production was at a par of vocal and dramatic excellence attainable by but few schools and made possible at this one through the fact that Mr. Donath is an opera singer of many years' standing and has had infinite experience in the presenting of operatic excerpts by students.

At this time he himself sang the part of Max, and not only did he dress it charmingly and act it with rare skill, but also his singing of the music falling to the part was at the highest point of artistic excellence.

Two advanced pupils assisted him—Harriet Beckert singing the part of Agnes, and Lottie Krause that of Annie.

Miss Beckert has a beautiful quality of voice. She dressed well and acted with intelligence. Not being accustomed to singing so far from her accompanist, she did not always keep definitely to the key.

Miss Krause was pretty and vivacious, and the three singers, besides their individual excellence, presented the abounding trios of the opera with great spirit and style.

Ray—Ruth Ray, the very talented young Chicago violinist, who spent the past winter in New York studying with Leopold Auer, is spending the summer at her home in Chicago. She has placed herself under the management of Antonia Sawyer for next season, who has already booked a number of engagements for her, including a recital in the early fall at Carnegie Hall in New York.

CLEVELAND BOHNET PRESENTS TWO TALENTED PUPILS

Cleveland Bohnet, who taught for many years abroad and who last Summer came to the American Conservatory from Lawrence Conservatory, where he had been equally successful with his piano class, is just finishing his first year at the Chicago institution, and on last Wednesday evening at Kimball Hall he presented two of the gifted young students who have been under his instruction for the year.

CLEVELAND BOHNET

ESTHER ARNESON

These were Esther Arneson and Helen Pollenz, the latter being only twelve or thirteen years of age and the former still in her early teens.

Both are talented in unusual degree and both play so well as to argue conclusively that their teaching and their application have been fine.

Miss Arneson, very much at ease and definite in her ideas as to how she wished to present each number, was clear and musical in the A minor Rondo of Mozart and very brilliant in the Chaminade Concert piece, one opening the program and the other forming its close.

Between, she played five pieces of Schumann with much intelligence and an unusual quota of musical feeling, excelling particularly in "Soaring."

She also had a strictly brilliant task to perform in the modern group, including "La Chasse" (Liszt), "Preludium" and "Danse Andalouse" (MacDowell), which she played with great appreciation, and an "Etude Arabesque" of Hinton, which—whatever else may be said of it—is extremely difficult and which she managed beautifully.

Miss Pollenz—vivacious and very musical—was enthusiastically definite and clear in some Bach and wholly temperamental in the "Scenes of Childhood" (Schumann), which she played much better than most mature pianists can manage to do, while in her last group she was full of color and style and played also with surprising force, considering her slight physique.

This group—a very well-chosen one, comprised "Puck" (Phillipp), cunning and novel; "Elfin Dance" (MacDowell), played too much bravura, I think; "Nightingale" (Alabieff-Liszt), in which the melody line was remarkably well conserved, and the perennially interesting Rondo Capriccioso (Mendelssohn), which she made much more interesting than usual.

HELEN POLLENZ

Miss Pollenz is gifted in many ways, evidently, and offered as an extra two little pieces of her own, "Dreaming" and "Romance," which were well received.

THE RUSSELL CHORAL CLUB GIVES A CONCERT

Mrs. Estelle Russell, a charming woman and a thoroughly sincere musician, does not devote her entire time to voice teaching, although, indeed, she has one of the largest classes in Chicago to look after.

But, such is her ambition and her sympathy with the ambitions of others that she gives a great deal of time to a number of socialogical things and more to her Russell Choral Club than to any other one thing.

This Club includes about forty young women, who for the most part have serious duties to perform each day but who, through their intelligence and their love for music, prefer to spend a good part of their leisure time in singing rather than to fritter it away on useless diversions.

Only a few of them take private lessons, but, judging from the beautiful concert given at the Auditorium Recital Hall on last Monday night, every single one of them has a lovely voice and the ensemble that has been created through the efforts of Mrs. Russell is a fine one indeed.

They sing only lilting home songs, and nice sentimental ballads and a few mild humoresques, but everything is done with the purest of tone, the most refined of musical feeling and the very neatest phrasing and shading imaginable.

Enunciation has been carefully cared for, balance of parts is constantly kept in mind and sweetness of tone is insisted upon always, with the result that a concert by these fine girls is a treat indeed.

On Monday they sang a patriotic prelude, and then "May Morning" (Denza) and "At Dawning" (Cadman), and after that a whole lot of dainty, smoothly flowing things, including a "Mandolin Song" by Parker, with a very pretty obligato, sung by Ida Norem, and in everything they sang there was joy and sweetness.

The program was diversified by solos of fine choice and neat presentation, and while technic may have been a little lacking in some cases there was never, for a moment, any lack of musical feeling or poetical interpretation.

The solo singers were Edna Myers, Clara Link, Carol Gehri, Lydia Anderson, Ella Henning and Mayme Baumgarten—all making nice success, and their numbers included some of the neatest bits by Ware, d'Hardelot, Dunn, Methven, Tschaikowsky, Bartlett, Woodman, Dell Acqua, Craxton, Meyerbeer and Osgood.

Good accompaniments were played by Louise Treitz and an unusual and very beautiful March by MacDowell was so well played by Bernice Austin that she was compelled to add an encore. C. E. W.

Music at RAVINIA PARK

RAVINIA PARK SEASON OF OPERA, WITH MORGAN KINGSTON, FLORENCE EASTON, MILLO PICCO, LOUIS D'ANGELO AND ANTONIO SCOTTI OPENING NIGHT DRAWS LARGE AUDIENCE

Saturday evening, June 28, the season of opera at Ravinia opened with "Pagliacci" and "L'Oracolo," to one of the largest audiences in attendance in memory. This was Miss Easton's first appearance and she made a fine impression by her brilliant artistry and musicianly singing as Nedda in "Pagliacci" and Ahyoe in "L'Oracolo."

Especially fine was her singing of the "Bird Song" and the duet with Mr. D'Angelo. The latter's voice is lovely and he makes the Silvio a joy to hear.

MILLO PICCO

MORGAN KINGSTON

Mr. Kingston is without a doubt the greatest favorite at Ravinia of any of the tenors who have come and gone. He was grown each season as an artist and singer until one cannot help voicing astonishment. His voice was lovely in the dramatic Canio role and he made, as always, a great success in the Lamento. I must add that he has the ease and grace of an actor in his carriage on the stage.

FLORENCE EASTON

Mr. Picco found favor with the audience by his spirited singing of the Prologue. His Tonio is a role of good singing, and the "Barber of Seville," billed Saturday, July 5, this week is a great thing for him.

"L'Oracolo"

Antonio Scotti was imported for the Leoni Opera and was, as always, a fine singing artist. The opera itself is lovely as to music. The scene is Hatchet Row of the quarter Chinese in San Francisco. Miss Easton, D'Angelo, Rothier, Ingram and Harrold all gave their best to make the opera a success.

Mr. Papi conducted both operas and sustained all the best things thought of his work.

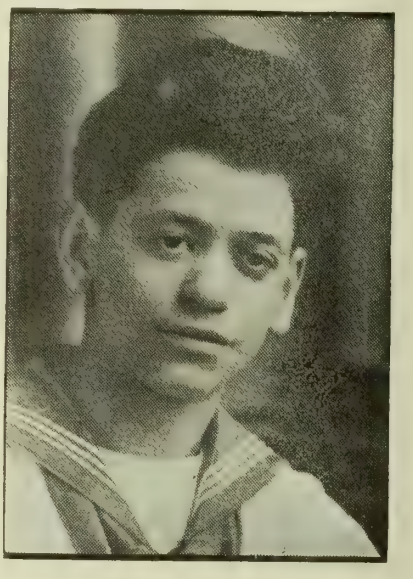
Chicago College of Music Commencement Concert

Aryan Grotto Temple was filled to the last seat on Tuesday evening of last week and there was the same eager, enthusiastic attitude of the audience which is always to be observed at the Commencement Concerts of the Chicago College of Music, an institution which is headed by Esther Harris-Dua and which year after year presents to the public at Commencement time a list of young people and children who prove conclusively that the work throughout the year must be continuous and painstaking.



MORRIS KUSHNER

There is always at this college the usual list of graduates and post-graduates as well as a teacher's certificate class and an artists' class, and the names this year, together with the lists of medal winners of various sorts, filled eight pages of the program, and not only was there such a great number of them but also many of them appeared on the Commencement program with much credit to themselves and to their teachers.

But the Chicago College of Music has another distinction and one which is so nearly unique that its recurrence year after year is always fresh cause for wonder.

This lies in the fact that the greater part of the Commencement program of this school is invariably given by little children, and as these are, mostly, piano pupils of Mrs. Dua, it seems to follow inevitably that she is a teacher of children with few rivals.

Other schools and teachers present in almost every pupils' concert one or two talented children, and the existence of the "wonder child" in Chicago studios is by no means rare; but Esther Harris Dua seems to have the very unusual knack of finding these children and developing them into concert players by the wholesale. And although this writer has attended each of her Commencement Concerts for ten years, he has never yet failed to find on the program a list of from six to ten absolutely marvelous children.

So it was on last Tuesday evening, and although there was some good singing by Norma Bodanis and Joseph Lincoln and some neat violin work by David Sheinfeld and Minnie Katz, and unusually good orchestral support under the direction of William C. Mobius, as well as a wonderful display of flowers and Commencement enthusiasm at the end, it was, after all, the playing of the very young pupils of Mrs. Harris Dua which attracted the vast audience, and it was this, too, which evoked continuous and extremely enthusiastic congratulations and applause.

Amazing to the final degree was the playing of Mayme Miller and Mollie Pomeranz, mere babies, while the Misses Siegel, Yalkovsky, Moore, Bernstein and Goldstein, though a little past the age to be accounted "wonder children," have all been heard by this writer when they were still very small girls, and are yet, all of them, in the early teens, and Morris Kushner, a very talented boy, who has played at several of the Commencement Concerts, is still so young as to cause wonder at his maturity of style and the brilliance of his technic.

Not to detail the work of these young players too much, it may be said, very cordially, that Miss Moore is certainly rapidly approaching the stage of young artist; that Miss Bernstein shows great brilliance of musical thought, while every one of the whole list reflected on Tuesday great credit on the training accorded by Mrs. Dua and each proved, also, that the work in the studio and the home must have been faithfully done.

In the long list of difficult concertos there was not one slip of memory nor one moment of indecision, but, on the contrary, there was constantly put to the view of the audience a clear-cut and musical reading and an always clearly defined technical command of each work.

In all the concerts given through the years by this school none is remembered from which Gertrude Weinstock was absent, and the program of Tuesday stated that she has played with the orchestra twelve times.

This is all the more amazing when it is stated that she is still in her teens and is a slight, graceful girl—immensely talented and so thoroughly in earnest in her work that it is very easy to predict for her a remarkable career.

She has just returned from New York, where she spent five months and where she created a sensation and won the commendation of many notable people.

She closed the program on Tuesday evening with the most brilliant reading of the Grieg A minor Concerto ever heard by this writer, barring only two or three of the internationally big artists.

She has wonderful poise, the most definite and clear technic; she shades remarkably and colors her work with a skill that is nothing short of wonderful.

To say that she created a sensation is to express the matter but mildly, for her playing was of that type and finish which in a little earlier and less blase day would have put her at once into fame; but she need not despair of reaching that eminence even in this time when music is just emerging from a cloud of five years' hanging—for she is so absolutely talented and so thoroughly prepared that in the resurrection period for music—now almost upon us—she is bound to rank very high among the young American artists, does she but persevere in her remarkable achievements.

ANNUAL RECITAL OF THE VOCAL PUPILS OF GEORGE W. MUNRO

On last Sunday night Lyon & Healy Hall was filled to the last place with a splendid audience, eager to hear the annual recital by Mr. Munro's pupils, knowing by past experience that it would be an artistic treat, and—after each number registering enthusiastic approval and, in several instances, a decided ovation for the young singer.

The program was so beautifully and so intelligently chosen and arranged that its reproduction in entirety here becomes a pleasure.

Every vocal class—no matter what may be its expression of method, good or bad—varies in basic material very much from year to year, and it so happens that the current season has found in the Munro Studios an overwhelming preponderance of very youthful, very sweet, and altogether charming voices.

That these are in possession of young women who have the added charm of manner and piquancy of personality is a fortunate coincidence, and when to these gifts is added the fact of fine method and musicianship attained with Mr. Munro the totality of result is pleasing indeed.

Not every one who appeared on Sunday night is a finished singer by any means—but, each one is, evidently, a very earnest worker, and also, as said above, the great majority of the voices are of exceptional quality and caliber.

GEORGE W. MUNRO

There was generally good enunciation, almost always true intonation, and, invariably, a very keen regard and strict adherence to the mood values and the tonal color schemes of the numbers presented.

Among those who appeared as beginners and who showed talent and seriousness of purpose and who, consequently, will achieve much as the months go on may be mentioned Ruth Larson, Mabel Plein, Wellington Golb, and Angie Montgomery, the last two especially showing splendid voice equipment.

Olive Reed, the possessor of a very rich voice, has style and finish in abundant degree, and was very successful in her two exceedingly dissimilar numbers.

Edna Peterson shows fine qualities both of voice and musicianship, and her attractive numbers were given with much effect.

Alphide Anderson—a bird-like young woman, with the most charming of style and personality, showed an exceedingly pretty voice and a most dainty interpretative impulse. She should find a very distinct market for her unusual gifts.

Gwen Griffiths is another very young singer who is gifted with an unusual voice and personality, but she is of the serious, definite type rather than of the light and airy variety such as is Miss Anderson.

Miss Griffiths' singing of "The Spirit Flower" was marked by the best enunciation of the evening, and the Borstorf song was also made exceedingly agreeable.

In Irma Burns Mr. Munro has a voice and personality which are bound to win very great success if perseverance is also a factor in the young woman's make-up.

She is pretty, charming and of a dainty but very positive style.

The Bratten piece was given with real coloratura display and the Puccini aria with genuine feeling for its dramatic import.

A very special feature of the program was the singing of Minnie Lang, an artist pupil of Mr. Munro, who has been heard often both at his studios and in other environment.

Miss Lang is the possessor of a voice of great power and resonance, and her use and control of it is at a remarkable point of efficiency.

She sang the big first-act aria from "Aida" and did it in a way to prove that the name role in the Verdi opera would be one which would lie easily within her vocal powers, while her intensity and musical expressiveness are such as to warrant that in the histrionic aspects of the part she would also excel.

She sang, further—Woodman's sparkling "Birthday" and gave it a brilliant, effective presentation.

Mr. Roney is a very wonderful trainer of boys' voices. This is a line of work that he delights in and which is made noble by his efforts. His specialty is the boy voice, but he also trains the girls' voices with equal success. This program proved to be interesting and delightful from start to finish. The chorus sang very well and under Mr. Roney's excellent leadership seemed perfectly at home in every number.

Master Harold Fidler has a clear, beautiful voice, such as one loves to hear. He uses it with skill, musicianship and charm. The same may be said of Masters Richard and Kendall Vail.

During the evening a friend of Mr. Roney, a man who represented Swift & Co., made a speech and presented each member of the class with one of "Swift's silver dollars."

Mr. Roney may well be proud of his fine class and the class may well be proud of and grateful to their splendid teacher.

HELEN M. BROWNE PUPIL IN RECITAL

One of those pleasant incidents which agreeably diversify the task of a reviewer occurred on Saturday evening at the home of Helen M. Browne, when she presented her pupil, Elizabeth Parsons, in an interesting and enjoyable recital of piano music. A pretty house, with good pictures on the walls, an excellent piano, and an atmosphere altogether cordial, to say nothing of the pleasant change in the weather, tended to make conditions so favorable that only satisfaction could ensue.

Miss Parsons is a talented girl in her teens, with temperament determined to express itself in her playing and sometimes interfering with the best results. She demonstrated that she was a faithful student and hard worker and had imbibed from her teacher a sterling regard for the music itself, seeking also to unfold its mysteries by the means imparted by one who has a fund of enthusiasm to supplement her knowledge of best methods. By all tokens the marked gifts of the pupil were in safe hands with Miss Browne, and development should carry her upward as past work tells and future inspiration leads.

A seldom heard sonata of Schubert had the place of honor on the program, arousing surprise that its loveliness is not oftener sent out to ears willing to hear other than the regulation things. There is an Andante in this which has Schubert in his fullest charm of melody and feeling. A Nocturne of Grieg had its own appeal and some of Miss Parsons' best playing. Schumann's "Bird as Prophet" came in for excellent treatment and MacDowell's "Ossian" was sensed vitally. Other numbers on the list were the Grieg "Bridal Procession," a Sinding "Caprice" and Loth's "Firebrands," all bearing evidence of earnest study and appreciation of their contents.

A punch which cheered but left no bad results was an apt supplement to the program.

ALBERT COTSWORTH.

JOHN J. BLACKMORE

John J. Blackmore, the well-known pianist, who has been engaged for a number of seasons on the Pacific Coast in teaching and concert work, has been engaged by the Bush Conservatory and has arrived in Chicago to take up his work in the summer school of the conservatory. Mr. Blackmore is a pianist and musician of wide cultivation, having had his first serious studies with that sterling artist, William H. Sherwood, years ago, followed by several years with Leschetizky, and later special work with Arthur Schaubel, Carl Treidberg and Percy Grainger.

Mr. Blackmore is also a composer with a decided modern trend, and several of his compositions will appear on artist programs next season, notably the "Nepenthe" and "Prelude in B Flat Major." The "Nepenthe" is dedicated to Mr. Arthur Shattuck and will be played by him next season. Several of Mr. Blackmore's advanced students are following him to Chicago in the fall to take up their studies at Bush, and he looks forward to a very busy season.

Mr. Blackmore specializes in the interpretation of modern compositions, and will doubtless be heard in recital next season. Mr. Blackmore is a personal friend of Percy Grainger, with whom he has coached, and plays many of that composer's works, being highly praised by him for his interesting and sympathetic rendering of many modern compositions. In his teaching Mr. Blackmore seeks to combine the best ideas of all schools—the firm foundation given by Leschetizky principles, offset with the newer ideas of relaxation, thereby gaining freedom and poise, so essential to all young artists.

Mr. Blackmore has a host of friends who await his arrival in Chicago with friendly expectation, and who are doing good work to further his interests here. In addition to his own teaching and public playing, he expects to present several of his advanced students in recitals. Among the most talented is Miss Frances Dodge, only 16 years of age, and who already plays with splendid musicianship, and who has an immense repertory for one of her years. Mr. Blackmore arrived in Chicago June 15.

Mr. Blackmore and Gustaf Holmquist will give a joint recital at the Bush Conservatory at 3:30 on July 12.

HORACE CLARK

From the pen of a Texas composer comes the song "Spring Dawn," published by C. W. Thompson. The song is very well written and deserving of much attention on the part of our Northern singers. It is in the category of the "Burst of Joy" songs and is exceedingly fresh and original in its make-up. It is short, simple and full of animation. We hope it will soon be heard on many programs. Other songs by the same writer will be reviewed in Music News columns later.

Mr. Clark is a teacher in Houston, Texas, a musician of high reputation, and a distinguished critic.

LEONORA FERRARI AT ORCHESTRA HALL

During the past week the fine orchestral and organ program at Orchestra Hall was beautifully augmented through the solo appearance of Mme. Ferrari, a soprano of distinctly fine voice, excellent training and a positive operatic style.

She sang, throughout the week, the "Jewel Song" from "Faust," with a brilliant display of technic, and "Carmena," the graceful waltz song of Wilson, which she invested with beautiful tonal quality and a fascinating lilt.

Her reception by the audiences was most cordial.

NORTHFIELD, MINNESOTA

The Eighteenth Annual Meeting of the M. M. T. A. on June 19-20-21 Presents a Splendid Program—Carleton College an Ideal Place—The Fine Chapel Organ Shown to Great Advantage —Excellent Programs—Interesting Papers

REVIEWED BY MYRTLE WEED AND CHARLES E. WATT

Thursday

The spacious campus and the ideal surroundings at Northfield not only make a fine setting for Carleton College, but the fine music hall, the dormitories, and, most of all, the ideally beautiful chapel were delightful adjuncts to the Minnesota Music Teachers' Association in their eighteenth annual convention held there June 19, 20 and 21. Many voiced the expression that they would like to convene there year after year, but it is found that the attendance is larger when held in either of the Twin Cities, so Minneapolis was voted as our place of meeting for next year.

After the singing of "America" at the opening session Thursday morning, with Mr. Edmund S. Ender at the organ, the president's address was given by George H. Fairclough of St. Paul.

Mr. Fairclough had been so honored ten years ago, when he served as president, with the same secretary, Mr. John Jaeger, who was in office then as now. He referred to the great upheaval that has gone on in the world since then and of the necessity for musicians to keep abreast of the times. It was suggested the members should memorize the statement of what the association stands for in regard to promoting the true culture of music. To uphold this standard members should be required to take the state examinations to join the association more than the mere paying of the active or associate membership fee, Mr. Fairclough stated.

The demand for all to become Americanized was emphasized. America first and always!

Mr. Raymond Johnson, pianist, of St. Paul, and a pupil of George H. Fairclough gave a half-hour recital, playing the following with signal success:

Prelude and Fugue in B flat.....Bach
Nocturne in F sharp.....Chopin
Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20.....Chopin
Etude Japonaise.....Poldini
Rigoletto Fantasie.....Liszt

A very keen interest was aroused in the young pianist's brilliant attainments. That he has quite mastered the art of concentration is evident from the fact that he memorized all his numbers with the exception of the Chopin Scherzo the past month.

His refined touch in the Bach prelude was delightful and he played the number with fine phrasing and accentuation throughout. The Poldini Etude was exceedingly attractive in his hands. The Chopin Scherzo was nobly played, with fine artistic shading and big style. The Rigoletto Fantasie was a brilliant close for the group.

At the afternoon session W. W. Norton of St. Paul Community Song, organizer for the War Camp Community Service, conducted a fine, spirited sing. Mr. Norton made us forget the sultriness of the day and brought the smiles—broad ones, too.

He spoke of "The Long, Long Trail" and "Keep the Home Fires Burning" as songs of the folk song type—they have come to stay.

In his address, "Some Phases of Community Singing," Mr. Norton spoke of the power of music in training our fighting forces, of the advantages of the "sing" over other forms in that its power lies in the active participation by all people. In ideal conditions, it is the embodiment of true democracy.

He declaimed the highbrow musician a criminal not to allow or want the mass to enjoy popular music, for the first and last problem is to get every one to sing. "The simple is necessary before the complex can be understood." Later the popular song will not satisfy, and in its ultimate development he sees true choral art as exemplified in the Bach choir a musical possibility.

An address of welcome was extended by Professor George B. Woods of the English department of Carleton College.

"There are too many nonproducers and too many nonhearers," he said, "for it is a rare privilege to enjoy music."

What constitutes music depends upon a person's point of view. The various sounds of nature, even the noise making devices in celebration of the glorious Fourth of July, are music to some ears.

GEORGE M. FAIRCLOUGH, RETIRING PRESIDENT M. M. T. A.

"Our sympathies are enlarged through the medium of music," he said.

Owing to Mr. Charles E. Watt having been delayed on his way from Chicago, Dr. Caryl B. Storrs, critic of the Minneapolis

MABEL McCABE

Tribune, gave a talk on Serbia, which he claimed was his fifty-second repetition. He thought the season had closed with the fifty-first repetition of it.

Dr. Storrs, with four other Minnesota men, sailed a year ago in April with the agricultural unit, which Mr. C. A. Severance of St. Paul headed. Of the music he heard he told of grand opera in Paris, and as bad a performance of "Thais" as he had ever heard in his life. Streets were very dark because of airplanes. In Italy the Royal Greek Opera Company of Athens gave surprisingly good performances of all nineteenth and twentieth century Italian operas. The folk songs of Serbia, in which its whole history, traditions and legends are recorded, are wild, formless and unrythmic, but nevertheless most impressive music. The Serbians celebrate certain battles every year and, according to Dr. Storrs, must have some very good voices.

Thursday afternoon an organ recital was given by Edmund Sereno Ender, professor of organ and theory at Carleton College, assisted by Miss Edna Mabon, soprano:

Mr. Ender

Mr. Ender is a concert organist of note and was formerly organist and choirmaster of Gethsemane Church, Minneapolis. His very well chosen program was one of the delights of the convention.

The Steere organ in the chapel is one of the finest in these parts, and he played it to decided advantage. Kinder's "In Springtime" proved a very effective number. The Stoughton number dedicated to Mr. Ender is from a Suite soon to be published. It is fascinating and colorful. "The Magic Harp" (Neale), with solo voice in the pedals and harp accompaniment with the lovely celeste stop, was interesting and attractive.

Grateful we were for the St. Anne's Fugue and the Cole Rhapsody, which requires fine pedal technic, was superbly and brilliantly played by Mr. Ender.

Miss Esther Mabon, who assisted, is a graduate of the college, under Edward Strong, dean of Carleton. She sang the "One Fine Day" (Madame Butterfly), with organ accompaniment, and her second number, "Life and Death" (Coleridge-Taylor), with the piano. She has a very pretty voice, clear and sweet, and gives promise of future endeavor.

Theodore Spiering, violinist of New York, with Mrs. Katherine Hoffman, accompanist, gave the Thursday evening recital, which included a Bach Suite, the Bach First Concerto, Romance in G (Beethoven), ballet music from "Rosamande" (Schubert-Kreisler), "Ways of Play" (Edwin Grasse), "Three Caprices" (Theodore Spiering), Serenata (Vieuxtemps), Valse Scherzo (Tschaikowsky), and "Barcarolle" (Toranger).

E. S. ENDER

Mr. Spiering's program was an exhibition of fine violin playing. The Three Caprices, for violin alone, were interesting, the third, a trill study dedicated to Jacques Thibaud, was fanciful and exquisitely played. It was received with much enthusiasm.

Mrs. Hoffman contributed in no small measure to the program, playing with her splendid artistry. Fortunate we were in having her.

address of Mr. Fairclough that we are glad of the privilege of repeating it here:

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of the Minnesota State Music Teachers' Association:

Once again we music teachers of the state of Minnesota gather together in this our eighteenth annual convention. We come for the first time to Northfield, and I am sure we all deeply appreciate the courtesy extended to us by the authorities of Carleton College in being given the privileges of this beautiful campus and buildings for our meetings. Our stay here will be very delightful and enjoyable, I am sure, and I know the few days we spend here will be in the nature of a restful and profiitable vacation. I think there are a great many advantages in coming away from the big cities to a quiet spot such as this for our meetings. We are not a large gathering, numerically, comparatively speaking, and we are rather apt to lose our identity as a body in the busy life of the large city. When we come away like this we hold together more, have our meals together, fraternize more, and have a better time all around. We are like one large family. There seems to me no better place to hold a musical convention than within the walls of a great seat of learning, such as Carleton College. Music is closely allied to other branches of learning, and is rapidly being given its proper place, and its due importance, in the curriculi of the leading universities and colleges. I think it would be fitting at some future time to hold our convention at our own state university in Minneapolis. It is planned to build, in the next few years, I believe, a large building for the music department of the university, and also to install an organ worthy of the state and institution.

I wish to assure you of my heartfelt appreciation of the honor you conferred on me last June in electing me to the high office of president of this association. This is the second time you have so honored me. Ten years ago I stood before you in a similar capacity as I do today, at Mankato. How many of you remember that convention? I am fortunate today in having the same secretary, John A. Jaeger, as we had then, and I wish to take this opportunity of expressing my thanks to him, and also to the chairman of the program committee, Miss Margarethe Petterson, for their untiring efforts in trying to make this meeting a great success. Mr. Ender also deserves a special word of thanks for looking after the Northfield end of the arrangements.

When I recall the first of my two terms as president of this association, ten years ago this month, I cannot help thinking what a tremendous upheaval has taken place in the world since then. Ten years pass quickly, but what a great deal can happen. The world has been shaken to its core, and new conditions are upon us. We were going along then in a comfortable, easy-chair manner, but now we must face things with a new mind. I heard an eminent speaker the other day say in a public address that even the books in his library were useless, were out of date. Of course this was a little far-fetched, but it gives an idea of what is upon us in the next few years. The methods of teaching of yesterday are out of date—coming to our own particular field. How are the new conditions affecting you and I as musicians, as teachers? Are we meeting these new conditions as we should, or are we going along in the same old rut which we were pursuing a few years ago? Are we receiving a higher fee for our lessons? Are we getting a larger salary for our church positions? Why shouldn't we, when everybody else is getting more for their work, to meet the much higher cost of living? If you received a dollar ten years ago, you should at least get a dollar and a half, or even two dollars today. If you do not, you are either unprogressive and hopelessly in a rut, or the people you work for are taking advantage of you.

As the world is gradually and slowly settling down to normal conditions after the most terrible and awful four years of its history, it behooves us musicians to gird our loins, as it were, fall in line, keep step with the rest of man's activities, and prepare ourselves for the most important era of musical development this country has ever seen. I believe there is a wonderful future for music in this country, not only as an art but as a profession. Times have changed. What "went" and was "put over" yesterday does not "go" now. The people are after good music and must have it. Where the farmer, a few years ago, provided his daughter with a parlor organ of the foot-pumped variety, today she must have a nice piano of good make, and he also sees that she takes lessons from the best teacher to be had, possibly a recent graduate of some conservatory, who is located in the near-by town. The flooding of the country with Victrolas, player pianos, etc., has whetted the appetite of the great American people for good music. Rather than undermining the business of the music teacher, as it was feared at one time, this condition has helped considerably. Good music is now heard all over the country in the moving picture houses, from organs and orchestras. The best music is played and there is a tendency to improvement from year to year. Who does not remember the small theater orchestra of a few years ago, of one violin, cornet and drums, inflicting rag-time on the audience between the acts? Compare that with what you now can hear at a good picture theater in any of our cities. A great era of musical activity is upon us. This country has taken its place alongside of the older European nations in the cultivation of the art. From now on it will not be necessary for us to send our students across the ocean for instruction. They can learn all that is necessary within our own shores. Let us all pull together and be Americans, in the true sense of the word. The days of the long-haired, slouch-hatted German professor, who did not even try to learn the language of the country of his adoption, are, thank God, over in this country. The most respected musician, in this land of ours today, is the whole-souled American, talking good American English. He may have been of foreign birth, but if he has come here to stay he will be thoroughly Americanized. Even those coming from England to settle here should soon forget their foreign ways and fall in step with the land of their adoption. Too many of them have a habit of belittling the music and everything else in this country, and of continually talking about the way they do it in "dear old England." From now on, more than ever before, let us all be boosters for America and everything American.

Let us now consider, for a few moments, ourselves, and what we have accomplished and what we are trying to accomplish. The constitution of this association states that "the general purpose of the corporation is to promote the true culture of music by the interchange of ideas, to advance the interests of musical art and to foster professional fraternity." I think every new member, when joining the association, should be compelled to memorize that statement and take an oath that he will endeavor to live up to the principles contained therein. Eighteen years ago the music teachers of the state were working as individuals, with little opportunity for getting together. I remember distinctly the first convention, which was held in St. Paul. I had just come to St. Paul and was a stranger. Joining the association, I immediately became acquainted with my fellow musicians of the state. I have been a member continuously ever since, never letting my membership lapse. After eighteen years what can we say we have accomplished as an association? Well, I think a great deal has been done for the good of the teaching profession and the art generally. In the interchange of ideas we have learned from one another; new ideas have been acted upon. We have become known to each other and there has been a kindly fraternal feeling engendered among us. We have taken up our routine work, after our meetings, with more enthusiasm, realizing that others were doing the same kind of work and having the same problems to face as ourselves.

But there is a great deal that has not been done which might be accomplished by the association. Active membership should carry with it more prestige. As it is now, any person who is a professional teacher of music may become a member by paying the sum of $3. There is a great weakness right there. Why shouldn't we require some standard or test of musicianship for membership? Every active member should at least be required to pass an examination, equivalent to the licentiate examination, offered by the association. A young lady came to me the other day to ask how she could get into the association. I said simply by paying $3. I knew, as she had taken a few lessons from me, that her knowledge of teaching was exceedingly limited, and that of musical theory less, and harmony still less. Nevertheless, she was quite eligible for membership, as she had quite a respectable number of pupils.

LUCILLE BROWN DUXBURY

The examinations in music this association inaugurated some years ago, and which, in my opinion, are the most important thing we have accomplished, are not fostered and encouraged by our leading teachers as they deserve to be. If we expect our students to take them we should urge, even insist upon them doing so. We know this is not done. Some of our teachers, I have been told, even discourage their pupils from taking them, and belittle the examinations. The examinations are simply a test of knowledge, not of skill as an executant. If one does not know ordinary facts about his particular branch of teaching, and cannot answer satisfactorily questions which one should learn in a first six months' course of harmony instruction, he or she should not be teaching, and certainly should not be an active member of the association. This brings us to the important question of standardization in music teaching and music study. This is the question of the hour all over the country, and we should make it our business to take active steps in regard to furthering it as much as possible. We are fortunate in having with us representatives of two publishing houses which have issued courses to be used as standards for credits in music in our high schools and colleges. We will hear what they have to say with great interest and profit, and possibly come to a clearer understanding of the matter. Credits eventually must surely be given for music study pursued outside the school from private teachers. Music is just as important a study as most of the subjects the students of our high schools and colleges are compelled to take, and if it is taught by properly accredited teachers, and under a standardized system, there is no reason why some credit system should not be adopted uniformly throughout the state.

In closing I wish to offer the sincere thanks of the association to the Northfield executive committee and the authorities of Carleton College for looking after our welfare so well while in their midst. I am sure we are all going to enjoy our visit immensely and take home with us the most pleasant recollections of the convention of 1919, held at Carleton College, in the city of Northfield.

Friday

After a twenty-four hour delay, caused by a wreck at Dubuque and bad railroad connections throughout, the Editor of Music News arrived in Northfield on Friday morning and thereafter was in attendance at the convention.

No more beautiful place than Northfield and nothing comparable to the Carleton College accommodations have ever been encountered before at a state convention.

The attendance was not great, but that is easily to be accounted for in the fact of the unusual heat for the time of year and also because of the fact that—unfortunately, commencement week (all over the state) was necessarily chosen for the convention.

Nevertheless, the attendance was typical of the best in the state—the programs were fine, and the general spirit could not have been better.

All in attendance at the convention stayed at the New Dormitory, a very beautiful building, and all meals were taken there, this fact establishing a genuine social center for the three days of the convention.

Carleton Conservatory

Headed by Edward Strong, who was formerly known all over the country as a concert artist, the faculty of Carleton Conservatory took the lead in hospitality, with the result that every one had a good time.

The conservatory has one of the finest buildings it has ever been my good fortune to inspect, and the status of the work as set forth in the catalogs of the school, as well as the brilliant examples of it shown in various ways at the convention, is proof positive that here is a school of the finest type, ideally located and housed, and maintained and fostered in the most logical and effective way.

Skinner Memorial Chapel

This is a really beautiful place—cool, airy, and with an atmosphere at once simple and elegant.

It seats about twelve hundred people and has an eighteen thousand dollar Steere organ, which is a model of beauty and style.

This organ was played repeatedly by Mr. E. S. Ender of the faculty in a way to prove him a master musician as well as a routined and thoroughly skilled organist technically, and it also was used to much advantage on Friday night by Edwin Arthur Kraft of Cleveland.

On Friday morning there was a business meeting, followed by an address by Alexander Henneman of St. Louis on "The Progressive Series."

There was much discussion both at this time and later as to the advisability of adopting this series as a part of the credit system whereby the State Association gives examinations and confers certificates.

The whole matter was finally laid "on the Following this a program was given, in which Margaret Dow, a brilliant pupil of Mr. Lawrence of Carleton Conservatory, played the Liszt E Flat Concerto with great surety, sweep and effect, having the best accompaniment this writer has ever heard short of a full symphony orchestra.

This accompaniment was furnished by Mr. Lawrence at a second piano and Mr. Ender at the organ, and, as said above, it was truly ideal and just as immensely effective.

Hazel Fleener, a young singer of Minneapolis, gave much pleasure in a list of songs by Rachmaninoff, Arensky, Korbay, Debussy, Duparc, Coquard, Carpenter, Grieg, and Eugene C. Murdock, the latter—a young St. Paul composer, being most gracefully represented by his "My True Love Lies Asleep," a song which he has dedicated to Amelita Galli-Curci, and which has been sung by her repeatedly in concert.

Katherine Hoffman was accompanist.

At 11:30 a paper on "Some Thoughts on the Teaching of Harmony" was read by James Lang, a member of the association of many years' standing, who was exceedingly popular throughout the three days'

Secretary, M. M. T. A.

session, and who was elected the new president on Saturday.

Mr. Lang put forward some very interesting thoughts. He thinks that only "basic material" should be taught in harmony and all detail evolved in actual usage by the pupil.

"For instance," he said, "to build up to one billion in a table of figures there are only eighteen basic facts. No child could ever learn one billion separate facts, but any child can learn eighteen basic principles and from these build up the billion."

The old systems of Richter and Clark were discussed, and it was shown how much better are the modern ideals which allow the child to reason out for himself each item that is contained—basically, in the rudimental principles.

The Minnesota Chapter of the A. G. O. tendered a luncheon to Edwin Arthur Kraft at 12:30, and this was followed by the monthly business meeting of the body.

At 1 in the afternoon a fine paper by J. Victor Bergquist of Minneapolis on "Musical Ministries of the Church" was read.

Mr. Bergquist, whose activities in music are legion, and whose successes are always pronounced, was prominent throughout the convention and always ready for service of any kind—including the very effective service of always being ready to take up discussion on any desired subject.

Mrs. F. E. Church of Owatonna chose for her subject "The Woman Organist." She said, in part:

"Men deserve world honors which they hold in the concert field. However, women have been the inspiration of some of the vast improvements made in the mechanism of instruments. Among those prominent in the concert field is the name of Rosalind Ellicott, daughter of the bishop of Gloucester.

"Dr. Ethel Smythe, a prominent suffragette, herself an organist, is said to have been striving thirty years to obtain recognition for the woman organist. Tschaikowsky in 1888 wrote considerable about her and her work. Over thirty years ago Aguste Lowell, a California pupil of Samuel P. Warren, was a soloist of much prominence, a noted player of Bach and Thieles, and an equal of her brother contemporaries. Today a woman, Mary Vogt, is playing the largest organ in the world, the Wanamaker organ in Philadelphia, and is now general music director.

"The present decade is offering women new and widening fields—the moving pictures and municipal music—and there are many women organists in church and concert work."

Mrs. Church predicted that the woman organist is rapidly coming into her own.

Mrs. Church is a shining light in her home town, and she it was also who, two years ago, almost at sight, played at one of the convention programs the accompaniments for a Christine Miller song recital and did it so splendidly that Miss Miller invited her, forthwith, to make an extended tour as her accompanist.

At 3 o'clock the Towler Trio of Minneapolis played a program including the Schubert Op. 99 and the Schumann Op. 88 with good effect, and alternate with them there was announced two groups of songs by Lucille Brown Duxbury, soprano, of St. Paul.

Mrs. Duxbury was suffering from a sudden attack of laryngitis and found her lower tones difficult to produce, but such is the excellence of her method and such the natural beauty of her voice as well as her undoubted musicianship that she rose above the condition beautifully and especially in the higher scale disclosed herself the possessor of a very beautiful voice as well as abundance of style.

Her first group was devoted to French numbers and the second to "I List the Song of the Golden Throat" (Natoma), an aria from "Goyescas" (Granadas), "Jeanette" (Treharne), and "Synnove's Song" (Kjerulf).

Fine accompaniments were played by Elizabeth Morton Dvorshak of Duluth.

At 4 o'clock there was heard a continuation of the discussion on "The Progressive Series" in the form of a talk by Agnes Page of the Northfield public schools.

The evening was given over to an organ recital by Mr. Kraft, which was chosen splendidly to the end of successful exploitation of the magnificent organ at Skinner Memorial Chapel.

Mr. Kraft played a genuine orchestral program a-glitter with technical display and full, also, of good contrasts.

His numbers were "Marche Triumphale" (Hagg), Serenade (Rachmaninoff), "Song of India" (Rimsky-Korsakoff), Barcarolle (Arensky), "Allegro Giocoso" (Dethier), "Contemplation" (Lemare), Scherzo (Hollins), "In Fairyland" (Stoughton), Overture in C Sharp Minor (Johnson), Minuet (Dethier), Arabesque (Seeley), Finale From the First Symphony (Vierne), and (by request) the Dethier Caprice, "The Brook."

. . . . . .

Saturday

On Saturday morning the postponed address of Charles E. Watt was given—and, by general request, especially of the many who were compelled to leave the convention before this hour, this will be reproduced in Music News columns, beginning today.

. . . . . .

At 10 one of the finest concerts of the convention was given to a small audience.

The artists were Adelaide Pierce, contralto, and Mabel McCabe, pianist, both of Minneapolis.

Miss Pierce is the possessor of a glorious voice—rich, warm and vibrant, and her style is full of authority as well as of complete artistry.

She has presence and poise as well as magnificent voice, and her musicianship is undoubtedly fine.

Interpretatively she is remarkable also, for she covers a wide gamut of expression with equal facility in its every phase, and she has the finest sort of individuality in her work as well.

The aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" was sung with great breadth and authority, the French songs (Chaminade and Massenet) with clear-cut artistry, while Handel, Burleigh and Buzzi-Peccia were presented with a sincerity and a breadth which proved conclusively that Miss Pierce must certainly be an artist par excellence in oratorio endeavor.

A complete recital by this fine singer would be a great joy.

Miss McCabe, who played so successfully in Chicago recently, repeated at this time one of the Chicago numbers—i. e., the Schumann Concerto, and invested it with breadth and charm.

At the business meeting, following, Minneapolis was chosen for the next place of meeting, and James Lang was chosen as the new president.

John A. Jaeger, who was the very efficient secretary this year, and who, with his attractive wife, did a great deal to make the convention a success, was re-elected.

After luncheon a splendid automobile ride was taken which embraced short stops at St. Olaf's College and numerous other points of interest, and the delegates all departed on the evening trains, carrying with them a warm feeling of regard for Northfield and the fine people there.

Also—there was a very general determination on the part of all who came to Northfield to attend the 1920 meeting at Minneapolis.

AN UNUSUAL MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT IN MINNEAPOLIS

The Minneapolis Sunday Tribune of June 15 devotes the bulk of its music page to a report of a Concert of Original Compositions given in the high school by students under the teaching of J. Victor Bergquist, and such is the scope and the importance of this movement and so unusual is the work of Mr. Bergquist (unique, in fact) that this article will be reproduced in full in Music News in a later issue.

Composition in music is a subject which has been given but little attention and encouragement, and the only way to get these is to prove their worth in actual results. The idea that only a few God-gifted human beings can and are entitled to try their hand at musical composition has been proven false by the theory classes in our high schools. A list of over thirty compositions for piano, voice and violin is the result of this year's work in these classes.

The value of these compositions cannot and should not be measured by their musical worth, but rather by the interest they have created in the classes. They may not be worth 10 cents to the musical world from a classical point of view, but they have and will prove their worth a thousandfold to the students who have by actual experience from these classes found an outlet for their emotional lines in musical expression. Expression and not merely impression should be one of the prime objects of education. The minds and hearts of students are not only cisterns to be filled, but the clear, fresh springs in human lives to be tapped by encouragement in self-expression. Far better a bungalow or real sentiment than a big storage house of dusty, musty facts. A walking encyclopedia is interesting, but a living spirit is more interesting. Students, trying themselves in musical expression, if only in a crude way, have had an experience in their lives which has added much to their musical understanding and appreciation. Impression and expression, appreciation and creation—four important words in the English language.

Manuscript programs will be given during assembly periods in West High, Monday, June 9; Central High, Wednesday, June 11; South High, Thursday, June 12, and on the evening of June 12 at MacPhail School auditorium.

Mr. Bergquist, whose work has received the highest of praise in Minneapolis, is further honored in the fact that the Minneapolis Tribune printed the following editorial in the same issue in which the successful composition program was reviewed:

THE RIGHT OF SELF-EXPRESSION

Elsewhere in this issue will be found an article describing the work in original composition being carried on by the music department of the public schools.

The Tribune believes that music instruction in the schools of Minneapolis is a combination of efficiency and vision, planned to awaken pupils to the value of music as a component part of life; a fiber interwoven in the fabric of character establishing an unfailing source of happiness and, if need be, of solace. The mathematics of the science are not allowed to obscure the glory of the art or to impair the pleasure of taking part in the presentation of its products. The severe traditions of do-re-me-fa and down-left-right-up are no longer routine restrictions; they have been enlarged into frames for beauty.

The recent competitive singing in the Auditorium by choruses from the grade schools was a surprising revelation of the attainments in this musical form. Cantatas, oratorios and light operas, given by high school choruses, orchestras and soloists are frequent events of holiday and commencement seasons. The special children's concerts by the symphony orchestra annually enable 10,000 or more young folk to hear music which they have studied analytically played by the greatest instrument man has yet devised. Mr. Oberhoffer has happily compared the privilege of conducting orchestral concerts for children to that enjoyed by the astronomer who first reveals the wonders of the sky to book students of celestial trigonometry.

To encourage musically inclined children to speak for themselves in tunes and chords before they have mastered the complicated sciences of harmony and composition is a far-sighted reversal of the usual educative process. Music is essentially the language of the emotions, and the child's right to early self-expression in this universal tongue is as indisputable as his right to speak before he learns to spell, read or parse. Impressions should not be dead weights packed into a plastic mind to limit its flexibility; they should be stimuli of expression. The immature composer may lisp, stammer, mispronounce and fail to make the subject agree with the predicate; but he will be feeling his joyful way, like the infant to whom letters are unintelligible and grammar unsuspected, toward freedom of thought, future facility of utterance, fuller appreciation of the significance of his art and a deeper understanding of its immortal masterpieces.

Splendid Performance by Festival Chorus Under E. F. Myers—Soloists Include Christine Langenhan, Harold Henry and Others—Large Attendance and Great Enthusiasm Mark Each Concert and Matinee

The annual spring festival of the combined choral societies of Amarillo, Miami, and Pampa, E. F. Myers, director, was held on Monday and Tuesday, June 9 and 10, in the Olympic Theater, Amarillo, Texas.

Unhampered by considerations which in the past have interfered with the full realization of its wishes, the societies were in a position to prepare this year's festival with ample equipment for all its concerts—a large chorus reinforced with new voices and soloists of high rank.

The festival opened Monday morning with a children's concert, the soloists being

Harold Henry in Piano Recital Monday Afternoon

The second of the public concerts was given on Monday afternoon with a piano recital by the well-known artist, Harold Henry. He rendered the following program:

Fantasie quasi Sonata (after a reading of Dante) ..... Liszt
Scotch Dances ..... Beethoven
Intermezzo, Op. 117, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Rondo—Perpetual Motion ..... Weber
Polonaise ..... Chopin
Keltic Sonata ..... MacDowell
Sioux Flute Serenade ..... Skilton
Album Leaf ..... Liszt
The Valley of the Bells ..... Ravel
Reflections on the Water ..... Debussy
Spanish Caprice ..... Moszkowski

He scored immensely and was forced to repeat several numbers in addition to many encores.

Tuesday Morning—Christine Langenhan in Song Recital

This eminent star, engaged for the second day of the festival, met all expectations of the capacity audience and scored an unqualified success.

Varied in character and of sustaining interest, and ever-increasing pleasure, Miss Langenhan opened her program with Handel's "Oh! Had I Jubal's Lyre," and sang her way into the hearts of the audience with her first number.

The ability of this visiting soloist was of high standard, genuine ovations of almost unprecedented enthusiam being extended to her during the entire recital.

It is evident that Miss Langenhan has the happy faculty of choosing songs that people like to hear, and then sings them in a manner seldom excelled at a local festival.

While her faultless rendition of the favorite soprano aria, "Cavalleria Rusticana," created marked enthusiasm, it was in her rendition of such songs as "Allah," by Walter A. Kramer; "The Look," by Rosalie Housman; "To a Swallow," by Metcalf; "Values," by Vanderpool; "My Love Is a

CHRISTINE LANGENHAN

Muleteer," by F. de Nogero; "Two Loves," by Reddick, that she scored heavily.

Her French group was extremely pleasing, and "Songs My Mother Taught Me," sung in Bohemian, was repeated by the singer in English words. The Swedish folk song, "When I Was Seventeen," was also redemanded.

Miss Langenhan favored with a remarkably pleasing appearance and gracious personality, possessing a voice of fullness and richness of tone that is unusually pleasing and even throughout the registers, while much of the real charm of her work is found in the real artistic interpretative ability and clear diction that brings the best out of every number.

The ovations accorded to Miss Langenhan were such in fact that the soprano, besides repeating many numbers, was generous to add to her extensive program the following three numbers: "Star of Gold" (Mana-Zucca, "The Land of the Sky Blue Water" (Cadman), and "Bess ob All" (Walter A. Kramer), which were not enough to satisfy the large and attentive audience.

Her program follows:

Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre ..... Handel
Allah ..... Walter A. Kramer
It Is Rainy, Little Flower ..... W. Blair
The Look ..... Rosalie Housman
In French—
Aria from Mignon—Connais tu le Pays ..... Thomas
Bonjour Suzon ..... L. Delibes
Ouvre tes yeux Bleus ..... Massenet
The Star ..... Rogers
To a Swallow (dedicated to Mme. Langenhan) ..... J. W. Metcalf
Values ..... Vanderpool
The Glow of Spring ..... Rungee
My Love Is a Muleteer ..... F. de Nogero
Aria from Cavalleria Rusticana (in Italian) ..... Muscagni
Lullaby (in Russian) ..... Gretschaninof
Songs My Mother Taught Me (in Bohemian) ..... Dvorak
When I Was Seventeen ..... Swedish Folk Song
Paradox ..... Cadman
Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen ..... Burleigh
Two Loves ..... Reddick
Sunrise and You ..... Arthur Penn
Ring Out, Sweet Bells of Peace ..... Caro Roma

Mrs. Lila Austin Myers, the accompanist, contributed in no small measure to the success of the singer and the enjoyment of her audience.

Tuesday Evening, "Messiah," Christine Langenhan, Soloist

This prominent singer, who scored the greatest ovation the same day with her song recital, climaxed her success in the evening, rendering the "Messiah" part.

The voices and orchestral instruments formed a fine and finished whole, and none of the shadings in color or nuances of interpretation indicated by Myers' baton went astray through lack of command or unanimity of response. He is a real choral leader. He understands the voice in its mass management and in its subtle application.

The chorus lived up to its reputation for skillful, musical and intelligent singing.

Miss Christine Langenhan carried off the solo honors of the evening, for her renditions were flawless and she was forced to repeat the two arias, "Rejoice" and "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth."

Mrs. Kiser, a local singer, displayed her splendid alto voice, and Miss Blanton, also a local contralto, rendered her number magnificently.

James Hardesty Johnson, tenor, of Minneapolis, was most enthusiastically received, as well as Mr. Mutch of New York, who sang the basso part.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE

The first half of the Saturday Morning Musicale at Ziegfeld Theater, last week, was held up to the usual fine standard and, in some ways, rose above the average.

There was present a brilliant audience, and the inspiration of the moment was sufficient to bring out the best of each of the young artists presented, as follows:

Piano—Sonate Pathetique ..... Beethoven
Adagio cantabile
Robert Doremus, Chicago
(Student of Maurice Aronson)

Vocal—Mad Scene (Hamlet) ..... Thomas
Lillian Nottleman, Oshkosh, Wis.
(Student of Mrs. O. L. Fox)

Piano—Rhapsody, Op. 79, No. 1 ..... Brahms
John Carre, Racine, Wis.
(Student of Rudolph Reuter)

Vocal—Inter Nos ..... MacFayden
Marie Gores, Wadena, Minn.
(Student of Adolf Muhlmann)

Violin—Variations on a Theme by Corelli ..... Kreisler
Graham Harris, New York, N. Y.
(Student of Leon Sametini)

This was followed by the appearance of the advanced students who have been awarded the Summer Scholarships given by Auer, Witherspoon, Saenger and Grainger to the most talented pupils to be discovered in the lists of hundreds who applied for the privilege.

This writer is told, on authority, that the amount of talent brought to light through these contests was amazing, and that scores of the most wonderfully gifted students were discovered in each department represented—violin, voice and piano.

Ruth Benkirt Wunchel of Des Moines is the fortunate winner of the Saenger Scholarship, and on Saturday morning amply proved her right through the remarkably good singing of "Ah, Love but a Day" (Beach) and "A Song of Sunshine" (Thomas), which she presented with fine tone and splendid artistic sweep.

Max Glickstein, a very talented boy of Newark, N. J., is probably envied today by nearly every young violinist of the country, for to him fell the prize of a term of lessons with Mr. Auer.

On Saturday morning (to the accompaniment of Leon Sametini) he played the "Fantasie Appassionata" (Vieuxtemps) in a way to prove that the choice had been well made.

Edith Friedman, a brilliant young pianist of McKeesport, Pa., has been adjudged the best of the many who applied for the Grainger Scholarship, and on Saturday morning gave a glittering and very clean, as well as a musical reading of the Tarentelle by Liszt.

So many and so good were the contestants for the Witherspoon prize that the judges had much difficulty in making a choice, and finally it was decided to give two scholarships, as it was impossible to decide between Jane Crawford Eller of Denver and John Hand of New York.

Both of them sang for the expectant audience on Saturday morning, and both walked away with enthusiastic approval, Miss Eller singing "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" (Saint-Saens) and Mr. Hand showing his good voice in "Cielo e Mar" (Gioconda).

CENTRALIZING SCHOOL OF MUSIC

On last Saturday afternoon the cozy little theater belonging to the Centralizing School of Music was filled with the friends of the various classes (as detailed in Music News last week), and the exercises of Acknowledgment Day were attended with much enthusiasm.

The Centralizing School does many things a "little different" from others, and this form of commencement concert, though unique, proved intensely interesting.

There was only a little music, but that little, played by Miss Malcolm, Miss Morgan, Miss Pendry and Miss Scott, was of a quality to prove that each young woman had fully sensed the meaning of the word "centralize," and had learned complete concentration as well, and had also acquired thoroughly satisfactory analytical powers.

There was a little singing, too, some presentations of certificates, etc., and a social hour afterward, with refreshments.

But all this was merely the usual thing, whereas the very unusual feature of the afternoon lay in the unique and equally fascinating little address given by Mrs. Paradis, the president of the school.

Mrs. Paradis can hold the attention of both old and young, and, through story, simile and happy turn of phrase, point her statements and illustrate the items she wishes to particularly impress.

Certainly no young student could come under the influence of such sane musical thought as that disclosed by Mrs. Paradis at this time and remain untouched by it.

The Artistic Temperament

We sometimes become impatient with what is often called the "artistic temperament," but if the artist did not have it, he or she would not have the ability to sway audiences. It is that impulsive element that wants to rage when the trunks are not put in the right place in the chautauqua tent, or that produces an explosion over some hard ravel that carries the performer to heights of fervor in public performance and into depths of depression the morning after.

Bless you, if these people were not different from the ordinary run of humanity we would not pay admission to see them. Don't growl at them. They suffer more than anybody else with their "nerves." The flowers out of place on the stage is such a little thing to the manager and the deficit or the renewal of the contract is such a big thing, in his horizon. But to the artist the business bugaboos are the trifles, and the piggly-wiggly .boy on the front seat is the big thing.

The Lyceum Magazine often has to send a bill several times to a genius—sometimes a collector! So often the genius "blows up." He writes over sheets and sheets showing our business department what harsh, unfeeling robbers they are. He tells them that when he contracted the obligation he did not know there would be a war, and that his wife would get sick, and that his sons would be drafted, and that he would collapse.

All of which is so! But nothing whatever to do with an honest obligation. And we go on admiring them and knowing that very temperament rouses audiences and melts icebergs, but is a most painful personal possession for them, bless them!!

And we feel that the "artistic temperament" is a wonderful thing to possess—especially if it can be harnessed.—Lyceum Magazine.

$5,000,000 Left to Encourage Love of Music

New York, June 26.—An unusual bequest was revealed today, when the will of the late Augustus D. Juilliard, who died April 25, was filed for probate. After providing for immediate relatives and making bequests of $100,000 each to various institutions, the will sets aside the entire residuary estate, estimated to be more than $5,000,000, for the establishment of the Juilliard Musical foundation.

According to the terms of the will, the scope of the foundation is to aid all worthy students of music in acquiring complete and adequate musical education, either at appropriate institutions now in existence or hereafter to be created, or from appropriate instructors in this country or abroad; to arrange for and to give without profit to it, musical entertainments of a character appropriate for the education and entertainment of the public; and to aid the Metropolitan Opera company in the production of operas.—Chicago Tribune.

Joseph H. Chapek in San Antonio

Professor and Mrs. Joseph H. Chapek of Chicago are spending several weeks in the city. They arrived Thursday from Laredo, where they attended the wedding of their niece, Miss Helen Richter, to Horace E. Watson. During their stay in the city they will be guests in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Otto Hegemann, 115 Cedar street. Professor Chapek is director of the violin department of the Chicago Conservatory of Music. He is well known in San Antonio and in past years has given many concerts here. Mrs. Chapek was formerly Miss Augusta Haenel of San Antonio, and is also an accomplished musician.—San Antonio Express.

Augusta Cottlow

The first appearance of Miss Augusta Cottlow in New York in several years took place last night in Aeolian Hall. Miss Cottlow—in private life Mrs. Edgar Gerst (her husband is serving Uncle Sam)—has grown artistically and intellectually since she was last heard here. She opened with a Busoni transcription of the Bach Toccata Adagio and Fugue. This she played with deep regard for its grandeur as well as its poetry. Bach's poetry is a sealed book to many pianists, but Miss Cottlow reveals it. Her next number consisted of the Nocturne in B major and Ballade in F minor of Chopin, both played with great beauty of tone and delicacy of nuance. For encore she responded with the "two-four" waltz. Then came her piece de resistance, for Americans—MacDowell's "Norse Sonata." This highly dramatic and powerfully beautiful work was splendidly played, with a profound sense of its deep dramatic significance. MacDowell's four piano sonatas are really great works; but they are tabooed by two classes: "made in Germany" musicians and American mediocrities. Miss Cottlow belongs to neither class. To enthusiastic applause she responded with "To a Water Lily."

Her last group included four sketches by Busoni on American Indian melodies and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz. Busoni's compositions are more Busonic than Indian, but they have charming moments and bizarre effects. Busoni's greatest work is done in his Bach transcriptions and propaganda; let us not complain if his creative power is not on the same level. The performance of the "Mephisto" waltz was brilliant and sardonic. Liszt himself would have enjoyed it.—Henry T. Finck in New York Evening Post, October 29, 1918.

May Peterson at Raleigh

It was not only May Peterson, soprano of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, but May Peterson, the lover of children, of animals. May Peterson, the charming and gracious, the beautiful, who charmed a large audience at the city auditorium Friday night. After a program that included as many encores as regular numbers, the artist gathered a group of children from the Methodist Orphanage around her at the piano on the stage and played and sang for them and others who crowded near. Across the way a group of students from the Blind School lingered to hear the last of the beautiful voice that had charmed them and with a thought of giving them pleasure, Miss Peterson crossed the stage to the dress circle and shook hands and talked with them.

Even before she sang Miss Peterson made a hit with the audience. On the steps leading to the stage a big collie lay panting and when the applause that greeted the artist's appearance died down he added his voice to the greeting. When the accompaniment began he walked calmly across the stage to take his stand by the singer. The audience, amused, watched to see what Miss Peterson would do. With a word to the accompanist to pause, she stooped and patted the shaggy head of the dog with a laugh and asked if there were someone in the audience who would lead the dog off the stage. While she was waiting she continued to pet the dog who had fallen a victim to her charms, walking across the stage with him. The audience applauded its approval.

Miss Peterson is beautiful, with as engaging and charming a stage presence as anyone would desire. She was beautifully dressed Friday night in a blue gown particularly becoming to her blond beauty.

There seemed nothing lacking in the charm and beauty of her soprano voice that is clear and sweet as a bird's note, fresh and spontaneous. With a wide range and unusual flexibility her high notes or low notes were equally beautiful.

Miss Peterson's thoughtfulness for the pleasure of her audience was shown in a feature of the program that has never been done here before. With a few words of explanation as a preface to the French songs on the program she gave that part of her audience, much in the majority, unacquainted with French an idea of what it was all about. The program was distinguished by an unusually delightful choice of selections, both in regular numbers and in encores.

Perhaps the greatest tribute to Miss Peterson was paid by the audience in the prolonged hush that followed the last notes of her "I'm Wearin' Awa', Jean," which the audience seemed loath to break by applause. One of the most notable numbers was Mozart's aria, "Allelujah.'

"Coming Through the Rye," "The Cuckoo Clock," "From the Land of the Sky Blue Water," "Last Rose of Summer," "Dixie" and other favorites were included in the encores. It was after a couple of encores after the last number that Miss Peterson seated herself at the piano and brought the audience to its feet with "Dixie." She followed that with "The Last Rose of Summer." The audience was pouring out of the auditorium, thinking that was all, when she gathered the Methodist Orphanage children about the piano and gave them the treat of their lives, a concert of their very own by a grand opera star. Truly it was not hard to understand why Petersburg, Va., is having a return engagement with Miss Peterson after only a week's time. If she ever comes this way again she will be greeted by a much larger audience than on this first appearance, for Raleigh people knew not what they were missing.—Raleigh (N. C.) Times.

Rose Lutiger Gannon at Evanston

Of the soloists, Mrs. Gannon, who belongs here, easily paled her imported associates; she knew what she was doing, and she did it with authority and skill. The others were Florence Hinkle, Arthur Hackett and Herbert Witherspoon, and of these the soprano was best.—Frederick Donaghey in Chicago Daily Tribune.

One of the best oratorio quartets ever assembled took the solo parts. These were Florence Hinkle of New York, foremost oratorio soprano; friend husband, Herbert Witherspoon, who is lassoing vast numbers of eager aspirants to his short summer session at the Chicago Musical College; Rose Lutiger Gannon, one of our own best contraltos, and perfectly able to hold her position in metropolitan company; and Arthur Hackett, tenor, of New York. Individually and together they gave of their best and helped to strike the keynote of success that is setting a new record for this festival.—Henriette Weber in Chicago Herald and Examiner.

The inaugural concert for this year was given over to a brilliant production of Verdi's "Manzoni" requiem, and the soloists, excepting Arthur Hackett, tenor, were all favorite concert singers who had been heard on previous occasions in Chicago. Florence Hinkle, soprano; Rose Lutiger Gannon, contralto, and Herbert Witherspoon, known also as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang their music with authority and certainty. . . . Mrs. Gannon came through with the music allotted to her with evident success.—Maurice Rosenfeld in Daily News.

Last night's soloists will not be heard again during the festival. In one respect this is unfortunate. For the great figure in last night's solo singing was Mrs. Gannon. She was the one person in whom a lovely voice was coupled with the projection of some meaning in the words and notes, which is good singing. Among the others there was either a good voice and complete coldness as to the emotional side of the music, or some attempt at the emotion with a voice that did not register it. The honors were accordingly Mrs. Gannon's, and they were signal ones, absolutely and comparatively.—Edward C. Moore in Chicago Daily Journal.

Of all the soloists Mrs. Rose Lutiger Gannon should be mentioned first, for she was undoubtedly the nearest approach to this ideal. Mrs. Gannon grasped the breadth and the dramatic quality of the music and gave us an authoritative and very correct reading. Besides, her voice carried extremely well, no easy accomplishment in the immense hall.—Herman Devries in Chicago Evening American.

Florence Macbeth Triumphs at New Britain

The annual spring concert held in Fox's Theater on May 14, at New Britain, proved from every standpoint to be the most successful ever given. Weeks before the event every seat had been taken up, so eager was the public to listen to the soloists who had been the feature of the past season in opera and concert field, and to hear Carl Busch's musical setting of "The Four Winds," from "Hiawatha," rendered by the New Britain Carol Society under the baton of F. Laubin.

Miss Florence Macbeth of Chicago Opera fame and Frederick Gunster were the special soloists and, as was anticipated by the expectant audience, in addition to the principal work in "The Four Winds," rendered some excellent solo work.

The former, who is unrivaled in tone production and whose wonderful voice is beautiful, clear, sweet and unchanging over every register—even to the pinnacle of the upper F natural—was a revelation in artistry and beauty and prompted an unrestrained flow of enthusiasm and applause throughout her program. Commencing her solo items with McFayden's "If," written specially for her, after numerous encores she concluded with Hallett Gilberte's "Moonlight Starlight," which fairly brought down the house. As the president said, so insistent was the audience that she might be singing yet, only the promise of her future appearance proved in any sense consolatory.

Mr. Gunster, too, earned a large share of the applause for his really effective and finished singing; his rendition of Vanderpool's "Values" being especially good. That he is a capable artist and was appreciated was proved by the encores he had to give after his numbers.

The interpretation of the "Four Winds" by the considerably augmented choir, accompanied by Miss Ruth Bennett, was not only enjoyable but was most creditable too, while the solo work and duet of the two special artists seemed to put on the finishing touches to a really splendid evening's performance and did much toward recording the concert as the most successful ever held in the town.

The Symphony Orchestra

It is good news that the New Haven Symphony Orchestra will continue its existence under the direction of David Stanley Smith. It has become a part of the life of the city and has added immensely to the musical reputation of the city. Its growth from its inception, when Morris Steinert gave of his best to it and guided its early fortunes by the compass of his boundless enthusiasm down to today, which includes the scholarly direction of Prof. Horatio Parker, has been phenomenal. It is amazing what Dr. Parker has done with the dream of Mr. Steinert, the place he has earned for the band in the history of music in this corner of the country. The two names will always be associated with its history as the intrepid pioneers in a daring enterprise. And now the baton falls into the hands of Mr. Smith, a young man of marked musical cultivation and human enthusiasm. This makes the future as secure as the past. It is now for the music lovers of the city and the friends of the orchestra to stand behind the organization and give it royal support.—New Haven Journal-Courier.

The Orchestra and the Young Musician

The appended information is printed verbatim as it was received from the publicity department of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra Association:

"Mr. Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, speaking in the name of the trustees of the orchestral association, makes an important announcement. This announcement is in the interest of musical education in America and one which will attract the attention of the entire country.

"In recognition of the standard of musical education in this community, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will give an appearance, with orchestra, to the best pianist and the best violinist among the students of Cook county, the winners to be chosen by competitive examination.

"Such an opportunity has never been offered to students in this country to appear with an organization of the standing of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. This present offer is made because the trustees of the orchestral association and Mr. Stock are convinced that the best students of this community are worthy of such an honor.

"The contestants will be judged by artists of international reputation and who are entirely without local connections.

"An announcement of the rules governing the competition will be published in due season.

"The successful contestants will be given the honor of a public appearance with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra during the coming season."

This is indeed good news, a laudable effort of Mr. Stock and of the orchestra trustees and management to foster and launch under the most brilliant auspices possible our local talent, especially as opportunities for public appearance are rare and costly.

Would not this beneficent influence be of still greater public usefulness if it were to include young singers as well as pianists and violinists? Why this discrimination in favor of the instrumentalists? The piano is no more an essential of the orchestra than the voice.—Herman Devries in Chicago American.

Dr. Lulek in Concerts

Paris—If the first concert given by the celebrated singer, Dr. Lulek, was a great success, the second, given at the Salle Aeolian, was a real triumph. In fact, the great singer was unsurpassed in a series of choice Lieder by Brahms and Richard Strauss.—Le Gaulois.

Paris—Great success, Tuesday, at the Salle Aeolian, for the celebrated baritone, Dr. Fery Lulek. His beautiful voice, rich and sonorous, captivated the fashionable and artistic audience that completely filled the Salle. The program, which was entirely consecrated to Schubert, comprised a dozen numbers, the interpretation of which was most remarkable. Dr. Lulek's style, ever adequate to the work interpreted, together with the incomparable charm of his diction, places him in the very front rank of great Lieder singers.—Le Figaro.

London—In the evening a successful appearance in London accomplished by Dr. Lulek, who possesses a baritone voice of wide range, over which he has obtained sure control. An earnest and cultivated singer, Dr. Lnlek soon won over his audience and drew obviously sincere applause.—Daily Telegraph.

London—After winning considerable approval in private circles, Dr. Lulek made his first public appearance in this country at Bechstein Hall last evening. One fact was made clear, and that is that Dr. Lulek can give expression to feeling with his voice without plunging to great depths. In itself that organ is capable of much musical tone. To songs of serious cast, the singer's fullest sympathies are given, and Brahms' "Auf dem Kirchhofe" was delivered with the exact vocal color without exaggeration. Tschaikowsky's song, "Nur einen Augenblick," heard for the first time, was given with all the nuance this interesting example seems to require.—Morning Post.

New York—Dr. Fery Lulek's first public appearance in Aeolian Hall last evening was one to cause his audience a great deal of pleasure, for the baritone has a voice and knows how to use it to the best effect. He first sang a group of Schubert and Schumann, and his interpretation of "Der Doppelgaenger" and "Die Beiden Grenadiere" aroused considerable enthusiasm. His voice, naturally of fine quality, is enhanced by a sense of proportion which he brings to bear on every note. His production of tone and the shade of color made his audience linger until all possibility of another encore was gone.—New York Herald.

HORACE CLARK

The following letter, written to Horace Clark by E. Clyde Whitlock, president of the Texas Music Teachers' Association, after the occasion of a program given in the Spring, is here quoted:

My dear Mr. Clark: I wish to take this opportunity of expressing my enjoyment in hearing your splendid songs last Saturday evening in Dallas on the Texas composers' program. They are examples of the finest type of contemporary American song writing considered both from the harmonic and the illustrative standpoint. I enjoyed especially "Night Time" and "Do You Remember." I feel sure that this program was by far the most impressive of its kind which has ever been given in Texas and I hope that the size and enthusiasm of the audience repaid you for your long journey.

Cordially yours,

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF MUSIC

Tuesday evening Otto Wulf, pianist and director of the National Institute of Music, presented students from the departments in a splendid program at Kimball Hall. Will Lewitt played the violin very well. He has talent and should grow. Four vocal numbers were given by Belle Parks, Jennie Hardy, Sallie Henry and Herbert Carlson. Opera selections were the offerings. Mr. Carlson was not heard, but the voices displayed by the ladies were of fine quality and they were sincere in their delivery of the songs. Henry Fluegge is a coming young pianist. He has technic, good musical feeling, and plays with a broad grasp of the work at hand. Marie Krohn made the first movement of the D minor Concerto (Rubinstein) lovely to hear. Martha Huber showed fine gifts in the Liszt E flat Concerto, playing with much brilliancy.

Mr. Wulf deserves commendation for the excellent showing made by the school and especially the work done by the students in piano. He has something worth while to offer as a teacher. His playing of the orchestra parts was a pleasure to hear.

Browne—Cornelius Corboy MacCarthy, pupil of Dr. J. Lewis Browne, gave an organ recital in St. Patrick's Church on Friday evening last. Mr. MacCarthy (who, by the way, is but seventeen years old) played with ample technic the greater A minor Prelude and Fugue of Bach, Rheinberger's Fourth Sonata and the Capriccio in B flat by Guilmant.

CARLO LITEN SUMMERING IN BELGIUM

Carlo Liten, the Belgian actor, who was heard in readings of poems by French and Belgian writers, and who appeared with several of the leading orchestras last season, sailed for Europe on Saturday last. He will spend the greater part of the summer at his home in Antwerp, but will be busy recruiting the additional players who will be needed for his season in French drama to be given at the Lenox Little Theater, New York, opening in December. While abroad M. Liten will give several open air performances of "Le Cloitre," the Verhaeren drama which will be his principal offering and will inaugurate the New York season.

LIDA BROWNING WHITE

The popularity of the little song, "Isn't It True?" by Lida Browning White, is attested by letters such as the following from Mary Highsmith Lyding:

My Dear Mrs. White: I cannot resist writing to tell you how much I am enjoying singing your fascinating little song, "Isn't It True?" The music is an exquisite setting of a charming little poem. I have already used it several times, to both my own pleasure and that of my audience.

Yours sincerely,

The Concert of the Lega Musicale Italiana

It was not a felicitous choice to give a concert when the season is practically ended. On June 22 the concert of one of the few artistic organizations in America—and a Latin organization it is—did not attract a large audience, and this in spite of the fact of several known artists being featured on the musical program. The artistic side was in some respects a success. It was opened by that splendid organist-composer, Pietro Yon. Excepting Enrico Caruso, no Italian artist deserves more praise than this splendid musician. As a composer he has demonstrated no mean abilities. His compositions are original; they contain melodies of unsurpassed beauty. As an organist it is no exaggeration to rank him among the very best in the world. He handles the instrument with skill; he manipulates the giant instrument with facility and draws a gorgeous tone. His force is superhuman.

CAROLINA LAZZARI

He opened the program with Ravanello's "Christus Resurrexit," and in the second part of the program he proved his gifts as a composer in the rendition of the "Sicilian Easter," a work full of original melody. We enjoyed his "Italian Rhapsody."

The Lega Musicale Italiana could not have enlisted a better musician artist. A pupil of Alfredo Martino, Flavio Venanzi, exhibited an agreeable baritone voice and an intelligent employment of it. Agreeable were his renditions of Giordano's "Caro mio ben" and "Allora," by Edoardo Trucco, who officiated as accompanist. Alberto Bimboni assisted at the piano in the rendition of his own composition, "Sonata Fantasia," for piano and cello. The latter instrument was played by Signor De Maria, who was not a satisfactory performer, while Signor Bimboni excelled in the handling of the keyboard.

I cannot praise the singing of Beatrice Melaragno, whose rendition of "Ritorna Vincitor," from "Aida," was amateurish, and she has a voice much too light for Verdi's music.

Mlle. Dazie danced and proved to be an excellent toe manipulator, but she was too heavy for the classics, besides lacking in grace and expression. In the "Danza Olandese," by Lortzing, she demonstrated herself to be an excellent characteristic dancer.

Signor Bonfiglio of the Metropolitan was admirable in assisting his partenaire. Another splendid Italian artist is Aldo Randegger, a pianist whose technic is phenomenal. He played his own "Elegia" and "Danza delle Vergini," from the opera "Media's Promise." He also excelled as a Liszt interpreter when rendering "St. Francis Walking on the Waves."

Four songs by Manna-Zucca were interpreted unsatisfactorily by Miss Otin. The composer was at the piano and gave splendid accompaniments. The songs rendered were "A Whispering," "Tell Me if This Be True," "Le Petit Papillon," sung in poor French, and "Mother, Dear."

Ferrari Fontana's voice of yore is no more today, but his rendition of "Otello's Death" was at least artistically sung. I was very pleased with the dancing abilities possessed by a youthful girl, Maria Gambarelli. She has grace, expression, dances lightly, is charming and has a promising career before her.

The event ended with the singing of "America Triumphant," a song by Giuseppe Pinsuti, who was awarded not long ago a $1,000 prize by the Italian National Song Contest. The applause was very emphatic and many encores were granted. This was the first public concert by the Lega Musicale Italiana, whose president is Signor Ferrari-Fontana.

Large audiences attended the entertainments of the week ending June 29th. The orchestra rendered "The Bat" Overture by Johann Strauss and directed ably by Hugo Riesenfeld. Miss Lesca sang "Caro Nome" with skill and a pleasant timbre. Percy Grainger's "Sundown" was executed by the orchestra, accompanying a film by the same name.

Fernando Carpi in Italy

The brilliant Metropolitan-Chicago opera tenor communicates to us his safe arrival at Milano, where he intends to spend the summer. On the steamer Giuseppe Verdi, he writes, there were quite a few prominent singers. Mr. Carpi is re-engaged at the Metropolitan, but previous to his appearance with that organization he will make a tour of concerts, which we do not doubt will please the music lovers. He will return to America the first of October.

Mademoiselle Capelle, though young, received the first prize from the Paris Conservatory. She appeared often in Paris and throughout the French provinces. Having organized a quator she visited the American camps, where our doughboys enjoyed the classic music. The quator consists of Mlles. On September 22 a concert was given in honor of General Scott and the Forty-first Division, under the auspices of the American Y. M. C. A. The concert took place at the Chateau de St. Augnau sur Cher. Besides the quator, Mlle. Suzanne Beaumont, soprano, and Mlle. Etchepore, accompanist.

We have already announced that this young and admirable contralto has been engaged at the Metropolitan for a period of three years. Ability must win, in spite of obstacles. Carolina Lazzari came to the front some twenty-one months ago, when Cleofonte Campanini engaged her. Twenty-one months have elapsed and we see now the splendid contralto joining the Metropolitan forces. During this period this Italian American artist has appeared in concert and recitals under the management of Charles L. Wagner, foremost of American impresarios. Miss Lazzari is one of the very few singing artists who has arrived through no "pull," no bribery, no flattery. We all know that ability is an asset employed when opportunity knocks at the door. Ability wins, but, what a strenuous struggle one has to make against strong influences. Few human beings are indeed so fortunate to climb up on their own merits, and among these few Carolina Lazzari has arrived through her own merits, artistry and voice. You who have never entered an opera house know little of the intrigues perpetrated by those who hold the destinies of an operatic organization. How much satisfaction can one derive when all sorts of pressure is being used because a certain artist who is perfectly willing to do her duty will never submit to the villainies and caprices of an operatic director. We are happy that, at least, one singer, Carolina Lazzari, has "arrived," as we say in the popular parlance, "on merit."

In twenty-one months she has succeeded in coming to the fore by the means of genuine artistry. She appeared with the fine quartet, one of the best of today—Giovanni Martinelli, Giuseppe De Luca, Frances Alda and Carolina Lazzari, an aggregation of voices, beautifully combined. In entering the portals of the Broadway temple we wish Miss Lazzari that success which she herself craves for. For the next season Miss Lazzari has bookings for fifty concerts. In the spring of 1920 she will go abroad to return in time to join the Metropolitan opera. The season of 1919-20 will see Miss Lazzari side by side with many an operatic star and she herself will be one of them.

Augustus D. Juilliard Bequeaths Five Million Dollars for Music

The cynics, including those who despair about our unappreciation toward the musical arts, will be pleased that a New York magnate, who passed away in April, 1919, has been thoughtful enough to bequeath $5,000,000 for music. Augustus D. Juilliard was a genuine patron of arts; his will provides the above amount. Not since the death of Bryan Lathrop, who left thousands of dollars for the Chicago Symphony, has music received such a generous remembrance as that of Augustus Juilliard, the New York financier. The will provides a musical foundation to aid students in music. The scope of the Juilliard Musical Foundation is to aid worthy students in securing musical education, either at appropriate institutions now in existence or hereafter to be created, or from instructors in this country or abroad. Concerts and recitals are to be given for the education and entertainment of the general public. The foundation is to aid the Metropolitan Opera Company in the production of operas. We hope that this generous will is to benefit the needy ones, and that students will be assigned to authoritative teachers.

A LITTLE VACATION

A little vacation, like a little learning, is a dangerous thing, for one is apt to desire more of each. Ten days was not a third long enough to make a flying trip to Williamstown, Massachusetts, right in the heart of the Berkshire Hills, and then run on to New York and Philadelphia en route, over the Alleghenies. Of a truth, the inclination is to record what was missed instead of what was absorbed. But that would be ungrateful.

My host, hostess and friends in Williamstown were Mr. and Mrs. Sumner Salter. Mr. Salter has looked after the musical demands of Williams College for twelve years or more, and left the impress of his exquisite taste and polish on every department where it has found expression. He is fully as eminent for his erudition and technical equipment, but I lay stress upon the refinement of his nature and a sense of the esthetic which is seldom at fault and yet so generous of attitude that it never affects a superiority. A man of this temper wields a degree of influence far reaching and powerful. His monuments are notable in the college. Many would place the mark of distinction on the superb Skinner organ in Grace Hall, which is something consummate in completeness and reflects him perfectly. But I should bestow the ribbon on the musical section of the College Library. A liberal musical education is right there. What we have here seems humiliatingly incomplete. His wife is the Mary Turner Salter of the lovely songs which enrich the English section of every recital program of importance and are in the repertoire of every singer, professional or amateur. They are the outpouring of a nature gifted beyond measure and so much like their creator that they sound just like her. They are singable because she knows how to sing herself. I wish I might repeat in manifold what she said to me about the texts of songs. She frankly says that certain songs voiced in other tongues seldom convey their full meaning when translated. But she maintains that English is as beautifully singable, liquid and musical in its flow, and exemplifies it in her own use of color, inflection and taste in unfolding her inspirations. To contact with Mrs. Salter is to be near something musically sacred.

They honored their western friend by asking him to play the wedding music for their daughter's marriage in the quaint old Congregational Church, so old that its architecture has Christopher Wren's name mixed up with it. In the high-perched gallery in the rear of the church was a nice organ with all the canniness of Mr. Salter's touch in its makeup. If I swell with modest importance hereafter, I should be excused, because on this organ last summer Joseph Bonnet prepared all his programs for the winter season. I prayed that some of his grace might linger about and infect my playing felicitously. They told me I did well, and we will let it go at that.

To have a week with these choice people in those glorious mountains was a species of rapture. One should not have many such experiences, for they would either put him out of touch with his ordinary routine or else he would grow to accept them as a right and therefore not make much of them. The home and hospitality were lovely, and Mrs. Salter allowed me such latitude as getting up at 5 o'clock in the morning for hikes in the mountains and to prowl around in the pantry and icebox for food before and after. Could friendliness go farther?

But there was also a reliable motor car, and Mr. Salter with leisure and inclination to drive. So we had great trips to Bennington, Pittsfield, Cheshire, Lenox and the Mohawk Trail over Hoosac Mountain. To a man from Chicago these were delightful. Of some of the drives and hikes the "Elderly Person" has stored away mild adventures, to be realted farther on. But I venture to tell those who can and have not seen the pink mountain laurel in bloom in June that there is a cog missing in their life experience. To see it as I did—well, that must wait! You shall have it some day. Also about the daisy and buttercup fields, with some comment on the rock crops of Vermont farms.

The trip down the Hudson River began with multitudinous icehouses, but its finale at the Palisades included the anchored fleet of warships, alive with jackies, and the bristling guns pointing every way from deck, hull and turrets. And it was red-hot on Fifth avenue on a Saturday afternoon. The Victory Arch at Madison Square was superb—the entire design worthy the city and the event. Comparisons are always pitiable, and so our melting angels on the lamp posts will be forgiven. The churches are always open in New York. To step out of the glare of the hot pavement into the cool loftiness of St. Thomas' Episcopal was a little taste of heaven. The grace and purity of its architecture are a delightful study.

Philadelphia is a purely domestic episode where a proud grandfather observes budding talent which may carry his name into other art circles. The ride through the Lebanon valley discloses it as fitly named. The "Pennsylvania Dutch" knew good land when they saw it, and promptly appropriated and took good care of it. All afternoon we puffed with three big engines over the mountains and saw the Horseshoe Curve force its way upward. And it was hotter in the mountains than anywhere else. The slums at Johnstown outranked in offensiveness the blackest darkness of Chicago's worst. A man, looking at some of the places where people were expected to exist, couldn't help feeling that he would embrace Bolshevism or anything else that would hint at an escape from such surroundings.

My trip was all orderly and happy. If you want the story of a dilapidated outing, get the editor to tell you how he lost his hat and speech and went the longest way round to take the same train home.

Driving toward Lenox one day, it was startling to read on a rural delivery post box the name, "Hugo Kortschak." I was near the home of the Berkshire Quartet, but it seemed like Chicago.

ALBERT COTSWORTH.

In October she will give the opening program at the Millard Avenue Woman's Club, in December a program of Christmas carols for the Bryn Mawr Woman's Club, and also, the same month, a program of Traditional Hebrew Melodies before the Council of Jewish Women.

KANKAKEE, ILL.

A public demonstration of the local Perfield harmony under instruction of Miss Alice B. Camper was held in Huling Hall last Friday evening. In the different tasks required of the children, they gave evidence of accuracy and careful training; they read notes and chords, gave names of chords from dictation and harmonized melodies.

The second part of the program was devoted to solos by the vocal students of Miss Camper, who has enjoyed a thorough, broad musical training under leading American and European teachers. Isabel Williams, Mrs. Ada Harrison and Nelda Lueth each sang their selections in charming style, and displayed well-trained voices of agreeable quality.

Miss Ruth Erzinger, pianist (pupil of Victor Garwood), gave a remarkable and brilliant rendition of MacDowell's "Etude in F sharp."

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

By ELIZABETH FORESMAN BAGG

(All rights reserved)

Foreword

In dedicating these pages to the music students of America I am giving my reason for having written them, for I can say with truth that I am well acquainted with her and with her needs. Everyone who has taught music in a large American city knows her very well indeed, for she comes to us in ever increasing numbers, with her youth, her ambition, her lovely voice and her pathetic ignorance of all that lies before her.

I say "she" advisedly, for the female of this species not only outnumbers the male, but presents in some ways a much more serious and interesting problem than does he. Each of these small-town girls who comes to us for study is, in her own mind, a potential Galli-Curci or Louise Homer, while to the teacher who tries honestly to help her along her difficult path, she is a fascinating mixture of power and helplessness, confidence and fear, virtues and faults, out of which may come anything—a great singer, a fine teacher, a plain, everyday musician or a pathetic failure.

To the honest teacher who looks for his reward to the attainments of his pupils, rather than to the grasping of their dollars, and who sees in each of these pupils another human problem to be studied and mastered, there is something terrible in the serene confidence and hope with which these armies of youngsters attack the big cities. He sees behind each young face the older ones, saddened by toil and anxiety, of those who are providing the sinews of war at a cost which no one knows but themselves. He knows that for every triumph achieved some heart has paid in blood, while for every failure another heart has broken. And the failures are so many!

All this the honest teacher sees; but what is more terrible, he sees the awful waste—waste of voice, youth, strength and money, which occurs when this girl from Iowa or Montana or Arizona, with the fresh, sweet voice, falls into the hands of those who are not competent, not honest, not careful. Over and over again it happens, this tragedy. Sometimes the victim rescues herself or is rescued before everything is lost. More often she spends all, and then, too late, gives up and seeks another field, or subsides into the third-rate artist or the teacher, who does her share to ruin the fresh voices that keep on coming.

It has been the sight of this sad carnage, together with the fact that I was myself a victim of it and only emerged, after years of patient study and work, into the posession of my voice again, that has made me wish to do my part toward the amelioration of such conditions. I have tried here to give my theories—no, I will not call them theories, for I have proved their correctness many times—nor should I call them mine, for they are only the simple and absolutely demonstrable rules for correct placement and use of the voice which are shared by all who understand and practice correctly the science of voice culture. For myself I claim only the credit of putting them, I hope, clearly and adequately before the young student who is not ready to comprehend them in their more technical exposition. Various teachers have various ways of saying the same things. This is the way that I have found effective in my teaching; it ought, therefore, to be both clear and comprehensive on the printed pages.

After all, good singing is easy, natural and right. The correct placing of the voice, and its use through proper breath control, all of which is elementary and must be accomplished before the student undertakes the serious business of his career, is, when properly explained, as simple as the multiplication table. When it is not simple, it is either because the teacher himself does not understand its principles, or because he persists in a technical form of explanation which to the beginner is pure muddle.

It is right and proper that a teacher of vocal music should know exactly what takes place in the pupil's throat when she does certain things; but is it wise or kind to bewilder a simple-minded child with these scientific details of an unseen mechanism? She will be impressed; the chances are that she will even believe you, just as she believes that the world is round, in spite of the evidence of her senses, but will it help her to her ultimate desire — the production of a properly placed tone in a reasonably decent length of time, so that her entire youth and capital are not exhausted in merely laying the foundation of a voice? Emphatically not! Ten minutes of concentration before her mirror, upon the throwing of the tone against the resonator in the masque of the face, will do more for her than an hour of throat clinics.

Unless the pupil feels from the very first lessons a conscious improvement, a beginning—however small—of the understanding of what is to be accomplished and how it is to be done, the teacher has failed in his first duty. There is no pupil so dense or so hampered by faults that she cannot begin to grasp the method of right singing very early in the game. Sometimes there is the barrier of language between the teacher and the pupil. The former is a foreigner, perhaps, and not sufficiently at home in our tongue to make his meaning clear to a pupil who may be slow to grasp distinctions. It is my hope that this article may reach some of these strugglers and make clear some point upon which her mind has been clouded—some point, perhaps, that her perplexed teacher is wondering why she doesn't grasp. This is missionary work—the bringing of light into the darkness in which many a music student is groping.

I do not say that the science of voice culture in its entirety can be satisfactorily taught by this or any other article. As in the study of a language, an oral demonstration is often necessary. Also, the watchful ear of the teacher must ever be on guard against faults into which the best pupil will sometimes fall. I do say, however, that a thoughtful and intelligent study of these pages will be of the greatest possible assistance to the student whose teacher is, for any reason, not giving her the correct idea of voice work. It will enable her to see that she is not being properly taught, and warn her of the pitfalls that lie ahead of her. It will also be of help to the young teacher whose power of expression has not sufficiently developed the clarity necessary for the imparting of the principles of her art. If, also, it should prove an aid to the student who lives in the small town and must take her vocal lessons now and then when she can visit the city, I shall feel that I have to some extent paid my own indebtedness to the simple principles that have enabled me to resurrect a voice that had assuredly gone down into the tomb owing to the carelessness and ignorance of those who should have protected it.

Breath Control

First in importance to the young singer is the understanding and control of the breath. This knowledge must of necessity underlie even the initial lessons. It is the very first thing toward which we must direct the pupil's attention, for all work not done in accordance with the law of the breath is wasted.

Much of a technical nature has been written and said in regard to the various kinds of breathing, also the diaphragm, intercostal muscles, etc., while learned diagrams have been drawn to illustrate the proper fashion of dealing with these interior mysteries. The principal necessity, however, is that the pupil shall understand not so much what happens internally when she sings correctly as how to sing correctly so as to make these necessary things happen.

The diaphragm, we are told, is "a muscle which separates the chest from the abdomen and connects the intercostal muscles," these being the muscles which connect the ribs. It is elastic and can be seen to rise and fall with the action of the breath. Let us imagine this muscle to be an elastic girdle which passes around the body below the chest and which expands with the inhaling of air and contracts with its exhalation. Some men singers wear rubber girdles in order to feel this motion—after the fashion of a woman and her corset. This is, of course, quite unnecessary, as the diaphragm and the intercostal muscles form a natural corset which in either man or woman expands and contracts with the action of the breath.

This is called "intercostal breathing" and has superseded the old and barbaric fashion of abdominal breathing and the altogether insufficient habit of chest breathing to which we find so many young girls addicted.

Let the pupil take her stand before the mirror, and with hands above her waist, over this natural girdle, let her practice diligently the inhaling and exhaling of her breath, noting the expansion and contraction of the diaphragm and ribs. We read of teachers who urge their pupils to lie down, to put weights on the chest, to remove the corset during practice hours in order to observe the action of the diaphragm. None of these eccentric performances are in any way necessary. If the pupil's diaphragm is working correctly it will be quite evident to the touch when the hands are placed lightly over it. Notice also that while the abdominal muscles do not in the least control this action, they will move slightly in accordance with it—but only slightly.

This is only a part of breath control, however. Once we have inhaled correctly, we must be able to use this breath in connection with the voice. After the breath has been correctly taken into the body it must be fed to the voice, for the voice must be supported and sustained by the breath. This is breath control. It is the breath, supporting but not coming through the tone, which gives power, resonance, color and quality—all of which go to make a beautiful voice. It is the economy of the breath which enables the singer to carry the voice through long phrases which the musical score demands shall not be broken.

Take, for instance, the coloratura soprano, Mme. Galli-Curci. Notice her marvelous control of the breath in the phrases where on high D she increases a pianissimo tone, swelling it to a big climax. All of which is accomplished by economy of the breath, feeding it little by little from the diaphragm, thereby keeping the tone firm and steady for an almost incredible length of time.

Let us look again at our pupil as she stands, hands loosely pressed over the intercostal muscles, taking the simple breathing exercises which are to teach her how to control the voice through that life-giving force, the breath. She inhales slowly, deeply, from the region of the diaphragm, filling the lungs until she has a full supply. Then slowly, economically, she exhales, the diaphragm contracting, the breath being repressed by the lips, for all the world as though she were slowly and gently blowing out a candle. Again and again she repeats the exercise, the intercostal muscles expanding during inhalation as the sides of an old-fashioned bellows when it absorbs air, and contracting during exhalation just as the bellows does when the air is driven out. Notice that the point of exhaustion or collapse—or, in simpler words, the spot where contraction takes place during exhalation—is neither the chest nor abdomen but the girdle which is formed by the diaphragm and the intercostal muscles.

This is the same process which occurs when the pupil begins to bring tone into the exercise, or, in other words, to sing; the only difference being, naturally, that in singing the whole process is hastened. One does quickly what in the exercise one takes time to do. There is no reason, except inability of some sort on the part of the teacher, why any pupil should not very quickly understand this simple idea of breathing and begin from the first to put it into practice in her singing; and no reason, if the pupil does her work honestly, why in a very few lessons the result of the work should not begin to show in her voice.

We all have voices; some larger than others, some more pleasant than others, and of varying range; but voices, all of them. With proper guidance we can all learn to sing at least correctly. The day has passed when only the remarkable voices are to be cultivated, for we are beginning to realize that many things are gained through voice culture besides the ability to sing.

There is, for instance, health. For years doctors have been recommending "deep breathing" for certain physical disorders as well as for the development of good chests and lungs. What is deep breathing but correct breathing? The simple exercises by which we learn the control of the breath which we must have in order to sing. I have had young girls come to me for no purpose except to develop narrow, flat chests into normal, healthy ones, and I have been amazed at some of the good voices that have been thus developed—voices that no one supposed existed and which, but for the girl's desire for a better physical development, would have remained undiscovered.

A recent article which appeared over the signature of Lillian Russell bears interestingly upon this point of health. She says: "Any child or grown-up may enjoy the beauty and health attending a well-developed chest. The sunken chests and stooping shoulders of the modern young woman and man could be developed by singing. . . . Singing lessons taken regularly will develop the muscles and open up the tubes and canals, clear out the organs and broaden the throat and chest to a healthy state permitting proper breathing, thus insuring perfect health."

In closing this chapter upon the breath let me say that breathing, like everything else in good singing, must be done easily. There must be no gripping the breath. The contraction must be the natural process which accompanies the letting out of breath. It must be practically involuntary, once it is understood. In singing, as in all other arts, "ease is the lovely result of forgotten toil."

PRACTICAL MUSIC QUESTIONS OF THE MOMENT

An Address Delivered Before the Minnesota Music Teachers' Association at Northfield by Charles E. Watt and Reproduced Here by Request of the Officers

PART I

Ever since they began to exist Music Teachers' Conventions have discussed questions pertaining to the art and the pedagogy of music and, as there are endless ramifications of the subject, they will probably be discussed to the end of time and—very likely, in Heaven we shall have papers on Harp Technic and Choral Singing.

But—just at this time, it seems to me, there are a lot of more practical questions which should be thought about and discussed and—although art questions and the various applications of pedagogy are important in the extreme, they can well afford to wait a moment while we talk of other and more practical things bearing upon the everyday life and the everyday problems of the musician.

These questions—or at least a great many of them, are—it seems to me, grouped about three specific points. These are:

(1) The Democratization of Music.
(2) The Americanization of Music.
(3) The Commercialization of Music.

(1) The Democratization of Music

Hours could be spent in telling of the Choral Singing and the Orchestral development of the country.

The music of the Community, the School and the Church all come naturally under the one heading of Democracy, and they have numerous points of similarity and contact.

All these items should concern the professional musician mightily—for, it is through the Democratization of music that the individual growth begins, and the Mass aspects of music, no less than the Individual effort, give the professional musician his clients and his livelihood.

Mr. Freund of Musical America says that it will be through the complete democratization of music that the loss of the saloon will not only be minimized in its effect on the populace, but will result also in immense growth of musical activities.

Reed Miller, the popular tenor, stated in an interview some time ago that the returning soldiers, with their new-born love for music, would form the nucleus around which a revival of Oratorio would materialize.

Mr. Freund is right, probably, in his statement—and Mr. Miller unquestionably has struck a leading tone in his assertion.

It is time—now, for all professional musicians to lift themselves out of narrow, personal ruts and to think out the ways and put into action plans whereby the whole public can be reached and influenced by music.

The development of music in the war camps was a wonderful thing, and the growth of the idea of Community singing all over the country equally so, and not only must these two red-hot ideas be conserved to the full, but also every other development of mass music and the bringing of the art into the very life of the Populace must be noted and fostered if we are to have a great National revival of music—and that, you know, we want and must have.

In Chicago the Symphony Orchestra gave twelve popular concerts last season in addition to the regular series, these being priced to the people AT COST. This plan, undoubtedly, creates a new clientele for the Orchestra, and it is one which should be followed wherever there are Symphony Orchestras.

All schools should foster the study of music to the fullest extent, and all students who have a predilection toward music should be given full credit for their study along that line.

Community singing and the giving of civic concerts should be pushed to the utmost in cities—large and small.

There should be high school orchestras, amateur opera companies, choral societies, and other mass developments of music on every side, and these should be fostered first by professional musicians and secondly by playground associations and every other civic body.

If there is to be a greater development of music in this country, it will come through the fact of music being put into the minds and the hearts of the people at large.

Therefore, every question of democracy, as it applies to music, is a vital question to all professional musicians.

It has been stated recently that the effort of musicians should be directed toward the appointment of a National Art Commissioner, and that the endorsement of a certain alliance of musicians is a desirable thing.

As for the Art Commissioner, he will come in good time, if necessary, but as for the alliance, I do not believe that any such organization should be endorsed or furthered unless it is built upon very broad and very democratic lines.

An association having for its purpose the democratization of music and the fostering of all practical questions connected with the life of the professional musician should have a board of directors and a set of officers chosen much more widely than from the list of officers of a single musical weekly. It should include all the great minds in music in the country, and should be governed by men (the best obtainable) from the ranks of composers, artists, publishers, manufacturers and writers, and can be a success only when built upon such broad lines as that.

But the interest in democratization and the effort to fling the influence of music far and wide need not wait upon any national organization whatever, but can and should begin with the interest and the effort of individual musicians and local committees, and should be fostered especially by all state associations.

Every question pertaining to municipal orchestras, municipal singing and municipal opera in your state, as well as all questions of music study in the schools and its greater development in the churches, should have your constant and careful attention.

To close this part of the subject, I wish to repeat two things that were said at the Musical Industries Convention, which was held in Chicago last week.

C. M. Tremaine, head of the Advancement of Music Bureau, said: "Important as music was to war, it is still more important in times like these, when its great force for harmonization can be used to settle much of the unrest."

George W. Pound, General Counsel and Manager of the Chamber of Commerce, said: "Nothing is impossible. Out of every great trial comes some great realization of constructive forces. Let us make our industry the greatest of all industries, for surely nothing is of greater good than the message of music."

YOST AND TALLARICO JOIN FORCES IN SONATA RECITAL

Gaylord Yost, violinist, and Pasquale Tallarico, pianist, joined forces in a sonata recital at Indianapolis June 18. They played a program of the following sonatas: Sonata No. 10 (Mozart), Sonata in G minor (Debussy) and Cesar Franck's Sonata. Both artists were in fine form and gave masterly readings of these works. This concert will not soon be forgotten by those who were privileged to hear it.

COLLEGE OF SAINT TERESA—FIFTH YEAR OF ITS HISTORY

The College of Saint Teresa, Winona, Minn., has just closed the fifth year in the history of its phenomenal development.

The commencement exercises began with a baccalaureate sermon, preached Sunday June 1, by the Rev. Patrick F. O'Brien, M. A.

On Monday morning, June 2, the exercises of commencement day opened with pontifical high mass, celebrated by the Rt. Rev. Patrick Richard Heffron, Bishop of Winona. After the mass the college faculty, alumnæ and students, in full academic dress, went in procession to the college auditorium, where the commencement convocation was held.

A notable feature of the occasion was the conferring upon Miss Mary A. Molloy, A. M., Ph. D., of the papel decoration, "Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice." The decoration was granted last November to the dean of the college for "distinguished service in the cause of Catholic higher education." but the ceremony was delayed until commencement.

The address to the graduates was delivered by the Rev. John M. Cooper, Ph. D., S. T. D., of the National Catholic War Council. Dr. Cooper gave great emphasis to the duty of Catholic college women to participate in whatever form of social service lies nearest in their locality.

Dr. Cooper was followed by Dr. Charles H. Mayo of Rochester, Minn. Dr. Mayo emphasized the necessity of better correlation between the liberal arts and the vocational and professional colleges. By a closer connection in curricula and some modifications, Dr. Mayo would correct the present enormous waste in time and ability that delays and curtails the service rendered by the learned professions today.

At the close of Dr. Mayo's address the candidates for degrees were presented by the Rev. Francis M. Kelly, D. D. The degrees were conferred by the Right Reverend Bishop. Among the candidates for the degree of bachelor of arts were five Sisters—two Dominican Sisters and three of the Franciscan Order.

The commencement peroration was delivered by the Right Reverend Bishop. The address was a masterly survey of the false philosophy current in the past century which culminated with invincible logic in the cataclysm of the war. The Bishop showed in a singularly lucid way the inevitableness of Catholic philosophy as the cornerstone in an educational system if we plan to conserve and construct rather than destroy in the future.

The conservatory commencement was held in the afternoon at 4 o'clock. The address was delivered by Professor Donald Ferguson of the University of Minnesota.

As a fitting rounding out of the first five years of its history, the alumnæ of the college were incorporated; the articles of incorporation were filed with the secretary of state a few days before commencement. The first regular meeting as a corporate body was held on the afternoon of commencement day.

The college is planning, through its alumnæ, the inauguration of a nation-wide movement to organize Catholic women in the learned professions and in the wide domain of social service.

Music News

Vol. 11 Chicago, July 11, 1919 No. 28

PASSING COMMENT

Music News is in constant receipt of publicity matter for the furtherance of the propaganda of Italian and of French music in the United States, and we, with all loyal and artistic factors of the country, are glad to give these matters our support.

We know the Italian music thoroughly, and as for the French, we have had almost a plethora during the past two years.

But, important as is the idea of furthering French and Italian music in this country and willing as we may be to lend our warmest support, there is another question which is of much more importance, and that is the question of American music.

We must have for our slogan "America First." We must give our own music and our own musicians precedence at all times.

After that we must continue to give our support and allegiance to the music of our Allies.

And, since we have shown so conclusively during the past year that we can be utterly independent of the music of Germany, we must not, now—revert ever to that time or that state where we feel that German music is essential to our musical life.

We must use it at its proper valuation when put into contrast with the music of the world and we must not, for a moment, allow ourselves to think that it has any values at all except those with which we ourselves invest it.

If we find it good and wish to use it for that reason, we shall do so. But we will none of it simply through the tradition that it is the best in the world, nor will we in future accept it on a "propaganda" basis.

It therefore gives us peculiar pleasure to reproduce here a letter from the Secretary of the Society of American Musicians and a copy of the resolutions recently adopted by this society:

The Letter

My Dear Sir: The Society of American Musicians, numbering over 100 of the representative artists and artist teachers of Chicago, unanimously passed the enclosed resolutions at their last meeting.

These resolutions voice the views of many nationalities now represented in our citizenship and in our membership, and it was the undivided thought of all that you be asked to share in these activities for the recognition and spread of American music and that of our Allies.

The Society of American Musicians has not even a remote connection with or relation to any political party or group, church or publication house—its sole reason for being and its entire activity is confined to the promotion of the good in American music and for the welfare of American musicians. This end it is achieving by all legitimate means and it has found co-operation abundantly and enthusiastically given wherever its purposes were understood and its professional personnel recognized as men and women detached from selfish motives or acts. Therefore in the name of greater American unity, and for the future of American music we ask you to give publicity to these resolutions and to add your word of endorsement should you be in harmony with their content.

Sincerely,

(Signed) FRANK VAN DUSEN,
Secretary.

Resolution adopted by the Society of American Musicians, May 8, 1919

Whereas, It is a matter of common knowledge that for years past one of the most insistent forms of German propaganda in this country has been through the establishment of German societies primarily intended to develop a love for German music as being the only music worth studying; and

Whereas, In the present condition of world-thought, it is impossible to regard German music as an abstract expression of the beautiful because of the persistent and insistent propaganda still carried on by ill-advised persons in the interest of German music for the purpose of unduly exalting all German music and restoring as fully as possible the pre-war condition of German domination in musical matters; and

Whereas, Our acceptance of, or acquiescence in, these conditions has led to a misapprehension of artistic values and has been and now is a detriment to our best development and a limitation of our knowledge of the extent, value and practical use of the music of American composers and composers of the nations leagued with us in the great war; and

Whereas, While we recognize America's obligations to the efforts especially of the earlier German musicians in this country in cultivating an appreciation for good music and for better educational methods, yet we insist that it is as imperative to overthrow alien domination in matters of art as it is in matters of politics and economics, in order that our national art may be free to develop along its own individual path; therefore

Be it resolved, That the members of the Society of American Musicians, as loyal Americans and as active workers in the musical profession, pledge themselves to a much wider study and greater personal use of American music and music other than German; zealously furthering, by all legitimate means, the recognition, advancement and use of such music in the studio, in the home, and upon the concert platform. Whatever is great in German music will survive, yet we feel that, until such time as the partisans of German music will permit us to listen to it without injecting German propaganda into the question of its enjoyment, patriotic Americans will hear it under protest.

A LETTER FROM MARY CAMERON

Following is a part of a letter from Mary Cameron, the young Chicago pianist now in Entertainment Service overseas, which was received last week by a friend in Chicago:

This morning I had a beautiful time. I played for the service in the fort of Ehrenbreitstein—just think of it, an American service in that great old stronghold! The minister talked on Faith—and the vaulted room, a German ammunition room, was filled with our dear boys. I tell you it was hard not to grow rather emotional, with the Stars and Stripes waving just outside the window, and the unassuming little chaplain with his two wound stripes, preaching the word of God to those youngsters. The boy for whom I played sang "If With All Your Hearts," and through the window I could see the house Mendelssohn used to live in—and I just nearly lost my balance through sheer emotion. We ended the service with "How Firm a Foundation," and tried to lift the roof with our ecstatic shouts.

"Better a worker without genius than a genius who will not work."

—Leopold Auer

A PLEASURE PARTY

Combining instruction and pleasure is an art that is a mighty stimulant to ambition and hard work. Henry B. Roney exemplified the principle on July 1 when, following the annual concert of his vocal students in the Fine Arts Building, he gave all his students, on July 1, a boat excursion and basket picnic down the Drainage Canal to Lockport free of expense, through the courtesy of the Sanitary District Trustees, on the fine boat Robert R. Chaperons for the younger set and several clergymen and other old time personal friends of the host made up a large party. They were accompanied by Mr. Sullivan, one of the engineers of the Drainage Canal, who gave an interesting running lecture on its construction and especial points of interest.

At Lockport the party was shown through the power house and the mighty machinery which raises and lowers the dam was set in operation for the benefit of the excursionists. An excursion to Great Lakes during the war, where Mr. Roney was one of the song leaders, was another one of the interesting pleasures he provided for his army of young friends and students.

Mr. Cook presented five pupils in groups of costume songs. Otilla McCord, lyric soprano, sang first on the program in a group of French songs and a very effective costume. The songs were well chosen and showed the brilliant quality and clear execution of the voice to the best advantage. In spite of a bad cold, the singer showed marked improvement in many ways since her last appearance, and it is to be hoped that this good voice will be heard more the coming season.

Mr. Reiche presented Mae Higgins in the B Flat Minor Scherzo, by Chopin; Henrietta Nolan, violinist, in Beethoven's "Romance," and the "Canzonetta," by D'Ambrosio; Franklin Paul, violinist, in the Wieniawaski "Legend," and "Valse Bluette," by Drigo-Auer, and Ralph Reckenmacher in the Second Hungarian Rhapsody, by Liszt. These young people showed most excellent training and a clear conception of what they were trying to do.

Elizabeth Ely-Blevins gave the second group in Mr. Cook's presentation in Indian costume, and was most successful along interpretative lines, in the "Invocation to the Sun God," by Troyer. The voice is a big, full mezzo-contralto, and her numbers were given in direct simplicity which was refreshing. Jeanette W. Derdiger presented the "Dancing Numbers," which were given with excellent taste by a number of very good-looking children. It was a mistake, however, to use the victrola accompaniment, as the music did not carry out into the audience.

Irene Sage sang a group of songs with more than her usual skill, in a most becoming costume. Her voice has gained greatly in freedom, and she sang at this time with more style than at any time in the hearing of this writer.

Edith Langdon Kresin sang a group of Old English Songs in a straightforward way, showing a very appealing voice and a delightfully free manner.

The last group of songs by Mr. Cook's pupils was given by Anna Brodman Rouse, contralto, in an East Indian costume. The voice is a warm, pure contralto, and the singer has a restful, quiet way of singing which was most effective at all times. Miss Rouse should go far in her art.

The last number was a clever arrangement for singers, dancers, violinists, with the piano, of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song."

Victoria Goodsell and Hazel F. Taitman were the accompanists, and gave just the right support to the singers.

Kimball Hall was filled with a most appreciative audience, and all of the numbers were highly applauded.

Both students were a distinct credit to the teaching ability of Miss Scott. They were not only thoroughly drilled and well prepared but both exhibited a distinct personality in their playing, which speaks admirably for their teacher. It is not every teacher who can bring out the originality of each student so clearly.

Miss Thompson did particularly scholarly work in the Beethoven Sonata, and her technic in the Liszt Rhapsodie was clear and precise.

Miss Lang, though younger and therefore less mature in her playing, displayed a distinct appreciation of moods in her little pieces, which were delightfully varied.

The girls were assisted by Frances Ingwersen, a vocal pupil of the school, who sang with good tone and interpretation.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

AMERICAN CONSERVATORY

Vierlyn Clough and Frank Parker gave a joint recital at the American Conservatory last Wednesday morning. Miss Clough's work was finished to the last degree. She possesses limitless technic and a diverse appreciation of musical interpretation. Her playing was indicative of much thought and scholarship as well as artistic temperament.

Mr. Parker sang several groups, chosen with a view to interest, and sang in good voice and good taste.

Both are musicians worthy of enviable standing in Chicago music circles.

The program follows:

FREEMAN STUDIO CLUB RECITAL

Ida Belle Freeman pretty well holds the musical affections of Austin in her hands. This is properly so, for she has been enterprising, industrious, up to date, and, above all, generous in her dealings with the suburb, and generosity is apt to bring returns of substantial character if one be patient and not demand them too soon.

Therefore it was not surprising to find the Baptist Church well filled on Monday evening or to find an attractive program being presented attractively by attractive persons, or to detect pleasure and satisfaction in the hearty applause recurring often.

The artist pupil who had the place of prominence was Gladys Severinghaus, blessed with a clear, even soprano voice and taught to sing easily and smoothly, to enunciate clearly and to follow the best traditions along interpretative lines. The voice and method lent itself well to the various arias and songs employed and reached a well-rounded climax in many portions of the "Valse" from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." It was a bit cool and dispassionate for the "Butterfly" aria, but jubilantly compassed Beatrice Scott's happy "Joy" and was mellow and limpid for Hahn's "Were My Songs."

Assisting was Minerva Severinghaus, a good contralto in the making. She used effectively Cadman's "Indian Songs," a cycle that will never grow old because of its enduringly fresh beauty. The sisters were heard also in "The Flower Duet" from "Butterfly" and met its exactions commendably. Koelling's "From Flower to Flower," a somewhat conventional duet, was another good vehicle to reveal a real charm in this reviving form of musical pleasure.

Jessie Adams, Miss Freeman's alter ego, was continuously efficient at the piano.

W. A. Dalpe, a violin player with big tone true in pitch, contributed several numbers.

A Class Concert

The annual class concert by the pupils of Miss Freeman was given at the same place on Tuesday evening, July 1. Those taking part, in a splendidly arranged program, were Dorothy Van Valen and Jessie Adams (accompanists), Lucille Reed, Irene Maiwald, Gladys Stoltenberg, Florence Glad, Lois Bowles, Ethel Boberg, David Vaughan, Madelyn Bentley, Richard Joslyn, Laura Clarke, Agnes Fisher Post, Mrs. M. G. Severinghaus, Eleanor Conforti, Alma Reed, Harold Edgren, Harry Hall, Laura Charlotte Thomas, Margaret Hall, Mrs. Charles Severinghaus, Carrie Putney Hamilton, Minerva Severinghaus, and Gladys Severinghaus.

MILON R. HARRIS

At the Milon Harris Voice Studios in Kimball Hall there may always be found a large and fine list of young singers, for, so long has he been teaching voice in Chicago and so long has he supplemented this special work with choral conducting, he has attained an acquaintance and a prestige which is second to no other teacher of the city.

The year just closing has shown a remarkable increase in attendance and interest, and this is especially true of those months since November.

For instance, of the fifteen young men who enlisted for war service from his class all are now back in his studio, excepting three, and his class throughout is at a very high point of talent and enthusiasm.

Among those appearing in concert and recital last Winter and Spring are M. M. Hamlin and James Parkinson, tenors; J. G. Graham and Gustav Voss, baritones; Misses Anna Charvat, Amelia Grande, Ruth Craig, Hester Haskins, Kathryn Langwell and Harriet Swanson, sopranos; Fannie Mileham, Jean Fallman, Mabel Waterhouse and Mrs. R. B. Griess, contraltos, with a large enrollment of second-year students and those who have been attending the Summer term (June and July).

The Fall term will open September 8 with a larger class than ever before.

The Calvary Presbyterian Church Choral Club and choir of sixty-five voices, of which Mr. Harris has been director for the past six years, has given two successful concerts during the season and plans are already laid for the early Fall. Many of the members of this society, as well as the soloists, are from the Harris Studios, and it is one of the best singing choirs in Chicago. It is a selected voice choir.

Mr. Harris' Summer term, unusually well attended, will close on August 1, and after a week's vacation he will go to Indiana, where for four weeks he will conduct normal institutes.

This is a work which he has been in for ten years and one which affords a combination of business and pleasure.

Teachers from all parts of the state find in his classes opportunity for study of the most effective sort, while Mr. Harris himself, in his spare hours, finds recuperation in automobiling, golfing, tennis and walking.

THE OSCAR SAENGER STUDIOS

Arthur Ellwood Bulgin, an artist pupil of Mr. Saenger, has just finished a very successful season, and with his wife, Helen Chase-Bulgin, the well-known accompanist and vocal coach, left town by motor for the West, where he will fill a number of concert engagements. Mr. Bulgin is the leading baritone of the New York Operatic Association, which gave a number of fine performances this past season, and he also sang two performances of "The Doctor of Alcantara" with the National Opera Company. He gave a splendid portrayal of Thomas in the "Marriage of Jeanette" at a benefit performance at the Selwyn Theater. He is baritone soloist at the Church of St. Edward the Martyr, where the "Crucifixion," "St. Paul" and "The Elijah" were given this winter.

Dorothy Stevens, a charming young artist from Oscar Saenger's studio, sang the leading role in a fairy play, "The Toy Shop," at a benefit performance given recently at the Punch & Judy Theater, New York. Miss Stevens was ideal in the part, for her lovely high, clear soprano, sprightly acting and dancing won her audience from the start. She was also commended for coaching the singing of the fifty little children who took part in the play.

Lhevinne—Josef Lhevinne, the Russian pianist, who has been interned in Germany during the war, has finally made all arrangements to come to this country and has cabled his manager, Loudon Charlton, that he will sail early in September. He has been absent from this country six years.

Music in Chicago

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE

The splendid Summer attendance at the Chicago Musical College was reflected last Saturday morning in the exceptional attendance at the 11 o'clock musicale.

Nearly every seat in the commodious Ziegfeld Theater was taken and there was great enthusiasm for the work of the artist pupils presenting the very well chosen program.

Esther Sopkin, a pupil of Alexander Raab, played the F sharp Impromptu (Liszt), and Jane Anderson, another young artist with the same master, played most beautifully a Chopin Polonaise.

Vocal numbers were well cared for by Sylvia Loder, Mrs. Pearl Scott and Elizabeth Bonner.

Two violin pupils appeared, both students of Leopold Auer. The first, Sylvia Lent, played the Wieniawski D minor Concerto, and the second, Abraham Sopkin, proved himself a distinctly fine young artist in the "Symphonie Espagnole" (Lalo), in which he had the artistic support at the piano of Marion Lychenheim.

Elsie Weiskopf, one of the finest students of the class of Rudolph Reuter, was brilliant and musical in the A flat Ballade of Chopin, and Mrs. Rhea Watson-Cable closed the program in the "Colonial Song" by Percy Grainger, with whom she is studying for the Summer.

It is difficult sometimes to make the Grainger compositions seem to fit the captions given them by the composer, and it must be confessed that this work, although played superbly at this time, is unusually uninteresting.

It is lacking in rhythmic impulse and in melody line and has not even color except in that brief (but inevitable) moment when Mr. Grainger uses the same glissando effect which, to him, is a habit.

This program, in entirety, proved to be one of great variety and very much charm. The young artists were fine throughout, and much credit was reflected upon the institution of which they are an artistic part this busy Summer. C. E. W.

STURKOW-RYDER AS A COMPOSER

Mme. Sturkow-Ryder's song, "A Pastorale," is heading the program of Jane English at the Hippodrome this week.

"Old-Fashioned Flowers," a new song by Sturkow-Ryder, is being introduced at the Alhambra Theater, Toledo, Ohio, by Mattylee Lippard, to whom the song is dedicated.

She has met with such extraordinary success that she has been engaged for another week.

Christian—Music News is in receipt of a card from Palmer Christian which tells that Mr. and Mrs. Christian will spend the summer at Valley Ranch, N. M., that they are enjoying improved health, and that they expect to return to Chicago next May, when Mr. Christian will again enter the field as organist, one which he is peculiarly well fitted to adorn and from which he has been greatly missed the past year.

HANS KRONOLD STUDIO NOTES

Hans Kronold, at his New York studio, is booking a fine season for the New York Concert Ensemble, consisting of Bertha Rodgers, contralto, and Earl Tuckerman, baritone.

The past season has been the best ever experienced by Mr. Kronold in New York, and he predicts a still finer season to come.

He played with great success twice during the season at Aeolian Hall, three times at the Brooklyn Academy, and filled many concert engagements out of town, besides being employed each Sunday at three church services.

He also gave a great many Lecture Recitals for the Board of Education and other institutions on Russian, as well as on modern French and Italian music.

Mr. Kronold will spend most of the summer at Shelter Harbor, Westerly, R. I., although he has a number of concert engagements to fill during that time. The summer reunion of the Kronold family will be most welcome, inasmuch as both Mr. Kronold and his daughters have been so busy and have been absent so often in war work for the eastern Y. M. C. A. that they have seen each other but rarely throughout the season.

Whitehouse—Horace Whitehouse of the Ohio Weslyan University College of Music, Delaware, Ohio, played an organ recital at the Methodist Centenary Celebration at Columbus, Ohio, on June 28, using the $50,000 Moller organ, which was especially built for the occasion. He played the Widor Symphony, No. 5, and pieces by Guilmant, Bach, Handel, Boellman and Franck.

NORA LORAINE OLIN STUDENTS

The plans of music teachers can go a-glimmering as easily as those of mice. Therefore, when the program which Nora Loraine Olin had arranged with her customary taste and intelligence received a severe jolt on Thursday evening, she took it philosophically, switched things about, secured a substitute, was her own cordial self throughout and once more demonstrated why she can put an individual mark on the students who come to her care. She has musicianship of a high order, is painstaking to a degree and carries such a cheerful enthusiasm that she infuses optimism into harmony.

Mary K. Allen appeared as vocalist and pianist, the latter as a pupil of Frances Frothingham. In both departments she gave commendable evidence of talent and zeal.

Elizabeth E. Warren has a voice light in weight but vibrant with musical feeling.

Geneva Doran was heard in a group of lovely songs, well prepared, and has a clear soprano at her service.

Miss Brown, another pupil of Miss Frothingham, added a MacDowell Polonaise excellently to make a pleasant evening that much pleasanter. ALBERT COTSWORTH.

ROY DAVID BROWN PRESENTS ADVANCED PUPILS IN CONCERTO PROGRAM

Roy David Brown presented five pupils at Lyon & Healy Hall on last Tuesday evening, each of them playing a standard pianoforte Concerto and the total of good work done being such as to prove that the Brown Studio is certainly a place in which piano virtuosity can be attained.

The five who played were Helen Marshall, Anna E. Spring, Chrissie Marshall, Lillian

ROY DAVID BROWN

Norman and Minnie Morris and the numbers they played were the C Minor Concerto of Beethoven, the B Flat Minor of Tschaikowsky, the G Minor (Schuett), A Minor (Grieg) and the "Hungarian Fantasy" by Liszt.

This choice of Concertos was a fine one and the interest of the audience was held closely not alone through the inherent brilliance and musical values of the numbers themselves, but also through the fact that they were presented with the proper contrasts, with good color and with a technical surety.

Helen Marshall showed repose and musical tone in the severely classic Beethoven opus, Miss Spring proved herself a student and a worker in the fact of playing the long and very elaborate Tschaikowsky number so well and with such accurate memory. Chrissie Marshall, a very young player with remarkable talent, again showed that she is unusual and altogether fine in her work, playing the rather uninteresting Concerto of Schuett in a way to make it seem entirely worth while. Miss Norman proved herself the possessor of a big technic and a broadly dramatic musical impulse in the glorious Fantasy of the master composer of Concertos, and Miss Morris, with the charming Grieg number, elicited lovely tone and a thoroughly interesting reading. Altogether, the program was one of unusual values and an equal amount of pleasure-giving qualities and the large audience found the program very much to its liking and was not the least bit diffident in letting Mr. Brown and his pupils know what it thought.

MR. AND MRS. STULTS IN A BEAUTIFUL SONG RECITAL

The first Artist Recital of the course to be given before the American Institute of Normal Methods in Evanston was presented at Fisk Hall last Thursday evening in the presence of a fine audience.

Monica Graham Stults, Soprano; Walter

MONICA GRAHAM STULTS

Stults, Basso-Cantante, and Nina Shumway Knapp, Accompanist, were the artists chosen for the occasion.

The duet singing of Mr. and Mrs. Stults is one of the rarest delights to be heard in this busy music center and at this time not only was there present the same musical charm and technical excellence of old, but also a choice of program numbers which was at once novel and exhilarating.

These included a very decided novelty, "La Camargo," an old Provencale air, arranged by Kurt Schindler; "You," written especially for Mr. and Mrs. Stults by Ruth R. Griswold; "The Hunt" (Bruno Huhn), "Legeres Hirondelles," from "Mignon" (Thomas), Pastorale (Saint-Saens), "Duo de L'Oasis" ("Thais"), "A Song from the Persian" (Foote) and "A Canadian Boat Song" (Mrs. H. H. A. Beach).

Throughout there was that same beauty of tone, fine quality of musicianship, good technic and intelligent phrasing which ever distinguishes the work of these two artists.

Mrs. Stults, who has fine poise as well as beautiful voice, distinguished herself anew with the ease and charm of her solo singing and especially in some marked pianissimo passages did she prove herself the consummate artist.

There were French songs by Fourdrain and Jacques-Dalcroze, and "The Message," a remarkable song by Blazejewicz, which made so fine an impression that it had to be repeated.

"Sheep and Lambs" (Homer) showed the serious bent in Mrs. Stults' singing, and

WALTER ALLEN STULTS

Phillips' "Wild Flowers" was engagingly light-hearted.

Mr. Stults has easy style on the platform, fine voice and remarkable interpretative gifts.

"La Serenata" (Tosti) was especially beautiful as presented by him, and the other numbers, ranging through dramatic impulse, poesy and humor, included "The Horn" (Flegier), "My Menagerie" (Fay Foster), "She Rested by the Broken Brook" (Coleridge-Taylor), and "Vulcan's Song" from "Philemon and Baucis," all of which were sung with fine expression and the best of musical effect.

GRANT KIMBELL RECITAL

Grant Kimbell gave a complimentary recital on June 26 to the members of the First Congregational Church of Oak Park. He has been there for many years and is leaving soon for residence in New York City. A splendid audience listened to him and he added another success to his long list. Mr. Kimbell has those rare artistic faculties which enable him to ably present many types of song and he made a strong appeal.

His program was pretentious, starting with a Handel number, which received the authoritative treatment so demanded in oratorio. A Strickland cycle contained some beautiful music and was splendidly interpreted with fine shading and ringing climaxes. Two operatic arias were given with fine strength and dash and the style of a veteran. "Onaway Awake," from "Hiawatha," contained some lovely tone work and was given with feeling. A brilliant group of five songs closed the recital and encores followed, of course—one about Tim Rooney being especially appreciated.

Mr. Edwin Stanley Seder played remarkable accompaniments and showed he understands the sympathy which should exist between voice and piano. He should go far in this work.

MUSIC IN THE SMALLER TOWNS

By EDITH POTTER SMITH, Kankakee, Ill.

It is a sane, sound principle which propounds our transmission to others that value and benefit which has accrued from certain events. Especially is this true in the music world, where the most is learned by experience. So this article is written in this spirit of helpfulness to other small towns.

Before the advent of artist teachers to the town under discussion, the same mediocre conditions in musical life existed which enthrall most small cities. A recital was to really musical people an excruciating event, because of a most evident lack of artistic finish. But in this locality advanced music students have, within recent years, enjoyed training in various branches under leading Chicago artists. Needless to say, the standards have been raised, and many splendid, artistic performances presented before the public.

Palmer Christian, one of the famous group of young organists who look ahead rather than to the past, has trained most of the incumbents of local church positions, and they all have increased the importance of good organ playing in the service. One of these in particular has made the organ an animate factor of musical life by giving frequent organ recitals in which are presented the best works of organ literature.

The musical environment of the religious service has been further enhanced by the voice training under Dr. Carver Williams, whose advanced pupils are holding solo positions in most of the churches. In addition to training the singers, he has brought to this city many of Chicago's best artists as soloists with the choral society, which he has conducted for several years.

The piano work has been in charge of Theodore Melitzer of Chicago, and recitals by his pupils are always interesting and entertaining.

Another concert pianist who has recently joined our noteworthy instructors is Cleveland Bohnet, who has already impressed the musical public with his brilliant, artistic recital and the effective excellence of his instruction, as shown in the student recitals.

The violin world has been honored by such eminent teachers as Ralph Michaelis, Alfred Goldman, and Herbert Butler, who have achieved marked results and produced two local violinists of exceptional ability.

The community owes much to these artists who come to the small city and spend their time and efforts to further the musical life of the town.

But, withal, our own local teachers have their full quota of pupils and are highly successful. So do not discourage your home teachers, give them every possible boost and opportunity, but provide your advanced pupils with expert instruction and watch the musical life and standards advance; and in turn the national musical atmosphere will benefit from the local progress.

Programs of the Fifty-first Annual Commencement of Oberlin Conservatory—Splendid Graduating Class—An Informal Recital of Violin Students—The College Choir at Second Congregational Church

REVIEWED BY MARY CARVER WILLIAMS

First Commencement Program

Commencement this year at the Oberlin Conservatory was a brilliant event, although, due to the war, there were no men in the class, and, also, the graduates were in the majority from the piano department. Following are the names of the graduates and an outline of the work they have done:

CLASS OF 1919

Geraldine Woodworth Crawford, Lorain, Ohio—Piano, singing, theory, history of music.

Helen Yvette Gasier, Waterloo, Iowa—Piano, organ, singing, theory, history of music, normal course in piano.

Mary Marguerite Gibbs, Kipton, Ohio—Violin, piano, theory, history of music.

Constance Ingham Harris, Plainfield, N. J.—Piano, organ, singing, theory, history of music.

Gertrude Heacox, Oberlin, Ohio—Cello, piano, singing, theory, history of music, normal course in piano.

Leah Holdridge Johnson, Greenspring, Ohio—Singing, piano, theory, history of music.

Carol Nickerson Judson, Wauwatosa, Wis.—Piano, organ, theory, history of music, normal course in piano.

Eva Verzona Kurtz, Nevada, Iowa—Piano, organ, singing, theory, history of music.

Lois Caroline Lawson, Moline, Ill.—Piano, singing, theory, history of music, normal course in piano.

Evangeline Marie Lehmann, Port Huron, Mich.—Singing, piano, theory, history of music.

Mildred Evangeline Long, Bellaire, Ohio—Singing, piano, theory, history of music, normal course in piano.

Alberta Lillian Peck, La Grange, Ill.—Piano, organ, theory, history of music.

Mary Lucile Purcell, Vincennes, Ind.—Piano, singing, organ, theory, history of music, normal course in piano.

Bertha Belle Taylor, Sheridan, N. Y.—Piano, violin, theory, history of music.

The program of the first half, heard by the undersigned, is appended:

Trio in D minor for piano, violin and cello
Allegro Moderato ..... Arensky
Miss Long, Mr. Koessler, Mr. Goerner

Spanish Dance ..... Granados-Kreisler
Rondino ..... Beethoven-Kreisler
Variations on a Theme by Corelli..... Tartini-Kreisler
Miss Gibbs

Suite Op. 15, for two pianos—Romance—Valse ..... Arensky
Miss Peck, Miss Kurtz

'Twas May, the Loveliest of Months
Up From My Tears Fine Flowers Are Growing
The Rose and the Lily
When'ere Thine Eyes I Gaze Upon Devotion ..... Schumann
Miss Johnson

Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, First Movement ..... MacDowell
Miss Kurtz and Conservatory Orchestra

Venezia e Napoli..... Lizt
Miss Crawford

Fantasie for cello and piano: Intermezzo—Humoresque..... Edward Schutt
Miss Lehmann, Mr. Goerner

Concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra—Presto..... MacDowell
Miss Lawson and Conservatory Orchestra

Miss Long did splendid work in the Arensky trio, the whole performance of which was tempered with musicianship and assurance.

The graduate in violin, Miss Gibbs, was a pupil of Charlotte De Muth Williams and played her group with good technique and an extraordinary amount of dash.

In the Arensky Suite for two pianos Miss Peck and Miss Kurtz both exhibited ability as soloists and a gift for ensemble playing.

CHARLOTTE DE MUTH WILLIAMS

Miss Johnson, who sang, possessed a mezzo voice of good lyric quality and with clear enunciation as the outstanding feature.

Miss Kurtz played the MacDowell Concerto with feeling and Miss Crawford possessed brilliancy, power and delicacy in rare combination.

In the Schutt Fantasie for cello and piano Miss Lehmann showed a solid technique and a keen ear for accent and Miss Lawson, who played the MacDowell A minor Concerto, had a brilliant and precise technique.

All the pupils were excellently prepared and played like thorough musicians. The conservatory orchestra, under Dr. Andrews, was very proficient in its accompaniments and furnished an ample background in interpretation and musical feeling.

A Sunday Morning Service

The college choir, singing at the Second Congregational Church, was heard on Sunday morning to good advantage in two anthems. It is a great addition to the service, and with Dr. Andrews at the organ did work which I have seldom heard excelled in churches. It is a rare opportunity, not only for the churchgoers of Oberlin but for the college students as well, to be able to have the splendid training in musicianship which must necessarily go with the getting in shape of a chorus of this size for church singing.

Charlotte De Muth Williams

One of the best beloved and thoroughly efficient members of the faculty of Oberlin Conservatory is Charlotte De Muth Williams, formerly a resident of Chicago and of Cleveland.

Mrs. Williams is an exceedingly active member of the musical world in general, for besides her teaching at Oberlin, where her class is large, she fills numerous concert dates. In addition to this her family of seven children demands much of her time and she is never-failing in her service and devotion. She is a truly wonderful woman, not only as a musician but in that larger field of character which is the real background of true art and musicianship.

More will be said of her work in Music News columns later.

An informal recital by violin students of Mrs. Williams was given during my stay in Oberlin, and the dominant point was clear, precise technique and conscientious work throughout. That teacher has really succeeded who can make that impression as clear throughout an entire program. That Mrs. Williams is greatly beloved and admired by her class one does not need to look far to find.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

On June 10 twelve young ladies from the more advanced class gave a Morning Recital at the Heizer Music School.

Mrs. Frederick Heizer presented two talented boy pupils—Dick McGraw, thirteen years of age, and Gilbert Kramer, sixteen years of age, in a joint piano recital at the Heizer Music School, June 24, in the following program:

Miss Ratliff graduated from the Sioux City High School in the class of 1919, and has been second violinist in the Heizer Music School String Quartet, which has appeared in Iowa and Nebraska upon numerous occasions during the past year. She is also a member of the Heizer Music School Symphony Orchestra, and is violinist in the Sioux City Municipal Orchestra.

THE ORCHARD SCHOOL OF MUSIC AND EXPRESSION

The program given by pupils of Ethel Lenore Clifford of the Orchard School of Music Friday, June 27, was a demonstration of the high standard maintained by Mrs. Clifford in her work. Each number was distinguished by fine tone, musical feeling, understanding and thoroughness. All were good, Carolyn Paxton displaying an unusual promise.

They were charmingly assisted by Antoinette Salathe and Hazel Younger, pupils in voice of William Clifford.

Yon—Pietro Yon, one of the most noted international organ virtuosos, is planning a transcontinental tour for the coming season, following the tremendous interest in music of this character. Mr. Yon, whose compositions probably represent the largest in point of number and most brilliant in point of quality for the organ, has arranged a program which embraces a group of his most interesting numbers which he will use himself on this tour.

ANOTHER SCHUMANN-HEINK TRIUMPH

The following reports from the San Francisco papers tell of the latest Schumann-Heink triumph, when the famous prima donna sang in a performance of "Elijah" at the Greek Theater, in Berkeley, Calif., and preceded this appearance with a near-recital of her own:

Thousands Greet Diva in Greek Theater—Mme. Schumann-Heink Given Ovation at Open-Air Concert in Berkeley

Ernestine Schumann-Heink was one cause of the gathering of music lovers. That became evident in the waves of applause that swept toward her at her first entrance for the concert numbers that prefaced the choral work. It was a welcome warm and hearty, acknowledged by the diva with her characteristic naturalness of response—a wide gesture of the arms as if to enfold the gift of goodwill. And the measure of applause thereafter gave her the preference over all others.

Her voice was in full plentitude of power—clear, sonorous and colorful. As one listened to its clarity and timbre and purity of tone it was hard to realize that this was the voice of one who celebrated her fifty-eighth birthday last Sunday, who has been singing professionally for forty-six years. Mme. Schumann-Heink sings ever from her generous heart, making her artistry vital and affecting.

She gave us a forgotten aria from Mozart's "Titus," Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," Secchi's "When Two That Love Are Parted" (exquisitely phrased and shaded), John Alden Carpenter's "Home Road," Pasternack's arrangement of "Taps" and Rogers' "When Pershing's Men Go Marching Into Picardy." In the last, she was splendidly dramatic, carrying her auditors so completely with her that when they arose at the fragment of the national anthem in the closing bars of the accompaniment they swept spontaneously with her into a swelling utterance of the anthem itself. After her recall she sang "When the Boys Come Home."—The San Francisco Examiner, Sunday, June 22, 1919.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the visiting artist, sang the role of the Angel in the oratorio, but preceded the work with a list of concert classics and simple songs that aroused her audience to great enthusiasm.

One expects a singer's powers to wane within a reasonable number of years, but Schumann-Heink showed a dynamic force yesterday that seems impossible of ever waning. She excels while under a dramatic tension, though there is a tenderness in those songs of the day that appeal to all hearts. Her list included the overture of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," an aria from that composer's "Titus"; Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," and the sentiment of Secchi in his "When Two That Love Are Parted."

She sounded the patriotic impulse through Alden Carpenter's "The Home Road," "Taps" and "When Pershing's Men Go Marching Through Picardy."

The oratorio, as a whole, was an excellent presentation. There was a generous opportunity to hear the ecclesiastical tones of Mme. Schumann-Heink, whose first recitative, "Elijah, Get Thee Hence," was given with authority and color. The impressive "O Rest in the Lord" is one that has for years been included on her concert programs and perhaps, more than anything she offers, is filled with the devout spirit.—The San Francisco Chronicle, Sunday, June 22, 1919.

ETHEL ANNETTE GIFFORD RECOVERING FROM HER RECENT ILLNESS

Ethel Annette Gifford has had to resign her position as director and soloist of the Chorus Choir at the Fifth Presbyterian Church on account of her illness, which culminated in an operation for appendicitis.

Mrs. Gifford extends thanks to the many friends who have remembered here while in the hospital, and who were so numerous and so generous in their sending of flowers that her room was nicknamed "The Conservatory" by the nurses.

Mrs. Gifford will rest and recuperate throughout the summer, and expects to resume her professional activities in the fall.

Music at RAVINIA PARK

REVIEWED BY CHARLES E. WATT

As told in Music News last week, the opening night at Ravinia Park was one of the most successful in history.

As a matter of fact, there were something like 7,600 admissions to the park sold on that evening.

The success of Scotti, Rothier, D'Angelo, Easton and others in "L'Oracolo" (Leoni) was marked, while Easton, Kingston, and

ALICE GENTLE

Picco walked away with great honors in the one act of "Pagliacci" given to complete the bill.

On Sunday afternoon, June 29, the following program was given under the artistic conductorship of Richard Hageman:

The Star Spangled Banner
March—La Reine de Saba ..... Gounod
Andante from Symphony No. 5 ..... Tschaikowsky
Salute D'Armour ..... Elgar
Intermezzo ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Ballet Suite from Sylvia ..... Delibes
  Prelude—Les chasseresses
  Intermezzo et valse lente
  Pizzicati
  Cortege de Bacchus
Suite L'Arlesienne No. 1 ..... Bizet
  Prelude
  Menuetto
  Adagietto
  The Bell Ringers
Prelude to The Deluge ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to Stradello ..... Flotow

On Sunday evening "Lucia" was given, Garrison making her debut for the season as Lucy Ashton, other parts being sung by Picco, Rothier, Derman and Falco.

On Monday evening the concert program was as follows, the soloists being Emma Patten Hoyt, soprano, and members of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra:

The Star Spangled Banner
Overture to Phedre ..... Massenet
Symphony No. 8, B minor (unfinished) ..... Schubert
Fantasia for Harp ..... Dubois
Overture to Bartered Bride ..... Smetana
Andante from Concerto for Violin, Op. 64 ..... Mendelssohn
A Group of French Songs .....
  Emma Patten Hoyt
  Isaac Van Grove, Accompanist
  Loin du Ball .....
  In the Mill ..... Gillet
  Bacchanale from Samson and Delila ..... Saint-Saens

Not only at this time, but at all the orchestra concerts of the week, Mr. Hageman as conductor was found to be in the most excellent of form, and the orchestra responded to his every minute indication promptly and with effect.

On Tuesday evening "Aida" was given, Florence Easton scoring a tremendous success in the name part, Morgan Kingston again showing himself as one of the finest operatic tenors now in America, as Radames; Alice Gentle making a pronouncedly good impression in the difficult role of Amneris, and Thomas Chalmers and Louis D'Angelo each scoring success in their parts, respectively, Amanasro and the King. Gennaro Papi, as conductor, again proved his power and his versatility, and the entire opera was given with much attention to orchestral and choral excellence.

On Wednesday evening "The Tales of Hoffman" gave opportunities to a long cast, all competent, and on Thursday evening "Il Trovatore" was presented, Kingston, Easton, Gentle and Picco again making fine impressions.

On Thursday afternoon there was a children's program, when some light but very good orchestral numbers, under the direction of Richard Hageman, formed the prelude to some community singing, which was led by Osbourne McConathy of Northwestern University School of Music and which proved to be one of the finest features ever introduced at Ravinia.

On Friday evening, July 4, the place was sold out in anticipation of a repetition of "L'Oracolo," but owing to the illness of Scotti this performance had to be postponed a week and "Trovatore" was repeated with great success.

The matinee of Friday had this orchestral program:

The Star Spangled Banner
March—On American Airs ..... Vander Stucken
Largo from New World Symphony No. 5 ..... Dvorak
Suite—Peer Gynt No. 1 ..... Grieg
  Morning
  Ase's Death
  Anitra's Dance
  In the Hall of the Mountain King
Solo for Harp ..... Selected
Overture to Poet and Peasant ..... Suppe
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Badinage .....
Al Fresco ..... Herbert
American Patrol ..... Meacham

The Saturday matinee found great favor with this program:

The Star Spangled Banner
Overture to Semiramis ..... Rossini
Andante from Symphony No. 4 ..... Tschaikowsky
Allegretto ..... Svendsen
Ballet Suite from Egyptian ..... Luigini
Overture to Raymond ..... Thomas
Benedictus ..... Philo A. Otis
Cosatschoque ..... Dargomijsky
Grand Pas des Fiances and Finale from Suite Ruses d'Amour ..... Glazounow

The Barber of Seville

In spite of the fact that Ravinia was uncomfortably cool on Saturday night there was a splendid audience present to hear "The Barber of Seville," and the total effect of the gay opera was unusually fine.

Picco as the Barber opened the proceedings with the "Catalogue" aria and at once showed himself to be in the very finest of vocal form and proved again, and very conclusively, that he has one of the best baritone voices now in opera in America.

He dressed the part splendidly and acted with conviction, and if he had not already been well established as a Ravinia favorite he certainly became so during the course of the Saturday evening performance.

Orville Harrold, dressed very unbecomingly, sang with more of purity and with better effect throughout than at any time, either in Chicago or Ravinia. If he but keep up to the vocal standard of Saturday night he will certainly be one of the favorites of the current season.

Miss Garrison sang the part of Rosina, introducing "Voce de Primavera" in the lesson scene.

Rothier was a magnificent Bassillio, and the other parts were well cared for.

LOUIS D'ANGELO

All the cunning and difficult little ensembles of the score were well managed, and the orchestra simply covered itself with glory by the beauty with which it invested the instrumental score.

On Sunday afternoon the following program was given:

The Star Spangled Banner
Overture to Mignon.....Thomas
Andante from Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven
To a Water Lily.....
To a Wild Rose.....MacDowell
Three Dances.....German
Moorish Dance
Shepherds Dance
Torch Dance
Solo for Harp.....Selected
Ballet from The Queen of Sheba.....Goldmark
Cansonette.....Godard
The Bee.....Schubert-Stock
Waltz—Legends from The Vienna Woods.....Strauss

On Sunday evening "Aida" was repeated; Monday evening brought another fine concert under the Hageman direction, including the Beethoven Seventh Symphony; Tuesday evening, "Il Trovatore"; Wednesday, the first performance of "Lakme," with Garrison, Gentle, Harrold, Rothier and D'Angelo; Thursday, "Cavalleria Rusticana," followed by an orchestral concert in which the feature was Franck's Piano Quintet, Mr. Hageman doing beautiful work at the piano, all this preceded by the second children's program in the afternoon.

Tonight (Friday) the postponed performance of "L'Oracolo" will be given; a concert tomorrow and Sunday afternoon, and the first performance of "La Boheme" on Saturday night, with Easton doing Mimi, and the fine allotment of men's parts being assigned to Kingston, Chalmers, Rothier, D'Angelo and Daddi, with Papi conducting.

Ravinia

By WILL REED DUNROY

(Reprinted from the Chicago Morning Telegraph)
At midnight when the shadows creep
Across the sward to join the wood,
The fairies and the pixies peep
In flowered cap and leafy hood,
And all the elfs and fays delight
The pulsing tenderness of night.

From far ravines the frogs resound,
The crickets chirp in chorus shrill,
And in the shadowed curtain round
Chimes in the plaintive whip-poor-will,
To make a symphony of sound
Where nature's melodies abound.

Through veiling clouds plays hide and seek,
While fireflies flash the darkened noon
With flaming, intermittent streak,
And in among the patient trees
Goes wandering a vagrant breeze.

The winds, in deep orchestral tone
Merge in with twittering of birds,
The tree toad from his leafy throne
Pipes in with soft, diminished thirds,
Where all the zephyrs sing and sigh
Beneath the brooding summer sky.

At midnight when the shadows creep
Like muted monks in stole and hood
The nymphs and satyrs lightly leap
Within the deep, secluded wood
To gladden with their sheer delight
The somber sadness of the night.

HELENE KANDERS

Helene Kanders, late of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who gave her first Metropolitan concert at Carnegie Hall last season and thereby established a record for success, is to desert grand opera entirely and devote her time this fall to making a transcontinental concert tour. Miss Kanders is one of the most remarkable women in music at the present time. She was born in California, but one would not suspect it. Her parents were Russian-Belgian, and she has done most of her artistic work in foreign countries. She is a woman of startling beauty of face and form, possessing a glorious voice. When she gave her concert last season here it was against the advice of many of the best known promoters. She refused to be daunted, however, and engaged the hall and conducted the matter in her own style. The result was the big hall was packed with an enthusiastic audience, and the music critics, with an admiration for her pluck and determination, found also excuse for most favorable reviews. At the time it was the chief topic of conversation in music circles. Now she is to top all concert artists in New York by giving no less than three Carnegie Hall appearances this winter.

THE SONG OF THE CHAIN—NEW COMPOSITION OF VOTICHENKO

Sascha Votichenko, the Russian composer, is planning to give an interesting recital in the fall just before leaving for the New England states, when it is said that his recent composition, "The Song of the Chain," will be heard for the first time. This composition was unconsciously suggested to Mr. Votichenko by the Siberian prisoners whom he visited while engaged in collecting the folk songs of Russia and Siberia.

"As they had no other means of self-expression," said Mr. Votichenko, "the prisoners made a weird kind of music by the rhythmic clanking of their heavy iron chains. I have endeavored to give some idea of this queer form of musical art in my own composition, but only those who have heard the 'Song of the Chain' as it is played by the Siberian life prisoners, can fully realize its deep pathos and tragedy."

AUGUSTA COTTLOW

Augusta Cottlow will concertize in America this season, after an absence in Europe of several seasons. Her career has been successful from the beginning and the promise of prodigal artistry of her early youth has been fulfilled in the continued triumphs of the years, until now she stands at the pinnacle of greatness few women pianists have attained.

When she made her first appearance in concert in Europe it was with only her American schooling back of her, and she won higher recognition for herself and the same for her American teaching. She was the first to give any of MacDowell's works on a European program, and her press notices all paid tribute to her peerless interpretation of the American master.

Miss Cottlow toured all of Europe and returned to America at frequent intervals, but few Americans have won the following abroad that Miss Cottlow has. An extensive Russian tour was abandoned on account of the war, and she returned to America.

Miss Cottlow had a splendid triumph at her Aeolian Hall recital last autumn, and this fall will begin her tour in the South, and her season promises to be a busy one.

She has signed with the Duo-Art to make records for them exclusively, and a number of her records will be on the market shortly.

Miss Cottlow's only appearance in Chicago this season was at Northwestern University, when she presented this herculean program and, in addition, was most generous with encores:

Toccata in C major for the Organ.....Bach
Prelude; adagio; fugue
(Transcribed for the piano by Ferruccio Busoni)
Ballade in F minor, Op. 52.....Chopin
Nocturne, D flat major, Op. 27, No. 2.....Chopin
Waltz, A flat major, Op. 42.....Chopin
Norse Sonata, Op. 57.....MacDowell
Impressively; at times with impetuous vigor
Mournfully; yet with great tenderness
With much character and fire
"Night had fallen on the day of deeds.
The great rafters in the red-ribboned hall
Flashed crimson in the fitful flame
Of smouldering logs.
And from the stealthy shadows
That crept 'round Harald's throne,
Rang out a Skald's strong voice,
With tales of battles won,
Of Gudrun's love
And Sigurd, Siegmund's son."
Reflets dans l'eau.....Debussy
Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt

Her playing of Bach was the most soul-satisfying experience a true lover of Bach could have, and if anyone lives who does not understand his poetry it would have been conveyed to them in her wonderful interpretation.

The endless amount of power she has and uses, seemingly without effort, made the Fugue a living fire.

Technic is never thought of by the auditor, for it has long since become a part of this artist. One revels in her interpretative art, and how varied and characteristic she sets each thing before you! Poetry in beautiful, sustained, dreamy nuance. Calmly vigorous in her portrayal of dramatic mood and varying it with brilliant, fiery, dashing bravoura. Chopin's Nocturnes played with deep insight; waltzes electrical displays of speed, rhythm and fleecy lightness, were trifles of technic. Debussy's "Reflets dans l'eau" was a contrast of beauties to those of MacDowell's "Water Lily," played for encore just before it. One's pen fails when it comes to expressing the sheer delight and consummate satisfaction this program gave.

ANNA GROFF BRYANT

Mrs. Anna Groff Bryant, director of the School of Three Arts, Lombard College, Galesburg, Ill., and local concert manager, left for New York City the first week in June, where she was called to attend a conference of the local concert managers of the United States and Canada. Mrs. Groff Bryant has been unexpectedly detained in the East, and will not return to Chicago to conduct a summer class, originally scheduled for July 5, until later in the month.

At present Mrs. Groff Bryant is attending the eleventh biennial convention of the National Federation of Musical Clubs at Petersboro, N. H., as state delegate—June 26 to July 6—after which she will return to New York City, where she has been teaching a limited number of pupils and completing final arrangements for the concerts of 1919 and 1920. Mme. Galli-Curci has been secured to give a recital in October.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.

The Ann Arbor, Mich., University School of Music has just announced the engagement of Mr. William Wheeler of New York City as head of the vocal department, beginning with the academic year in October.

Mr. Wheeler is an artist of wide recognition, having won an enviable reputation as concert artist wtih the leading orchestras and musical societies in this country. He has appeared numerous times in large cities of the United States and has sung at many of the most important festivals. For a number of years his professional headquarters have been in New York City, where he has filled several of the leading church positions, notably that of St. Bartholomew and Temple Emmanuel. His recitals of Old Italian songs and of other schools have attracted wide attention. Associated with him in this capacity has been Mr. Arthur Whiting, who has contributed the accompaniments and instrumental numbers of the times. He is also well known as a choral conductor, and has won a wide reputation as an excellent teacher, included among his students being many New York professional musicians. He is a college graduate and is thus conversant and in sympathy with the ideals and traditions of an educational center such as Ann Arbor. He possesses a beautiful lyric tenor voice of exceptionally pleasing quality, which he handles in taste and with good musical sense.

Mrs. Wheeler is also a musician of note, as is attested by the long list of Victrola records which both artists have made singly and in duet form.

The coming to Ann Arbor of two such distinguished artists will be a valuable addition to the large number of musicians now located in Michigan's university center.

FESTIVAL SERVICE, ST. JAMES' METHODIST CHURCH

The program which Tina Mae Haines offered in a festival service at St. James' Methodist Church on Sunday evening carried her customary marks of distinction, novelty and catholicity. The three traits do not always consort. There be those to assert that they cannot be co-equal. But it is to be stoutly maintained that, like all virtues, they should abide together. The best put together church service which does not have something for everyone falls short of the mark, in a practical way, however well it measures to argued theories.

Therefore, Pike's "Medley From the South" and Nevin's avowedly popular and stirring "When the Flag Goes By" gave such a tang to the occasion that the good orthodox Methodists unloosed their fervor and applauded in a church service! And, having broken the ice for their own pleasure, they met Miss Haines' stunning presentation of Yon's equally stunning big "American Rhapsody" with the same cordiality. It can filter down to New York that the first time this work was heard in Chicago was at a church service, and it created so fine an impression that it invoked applause! It was the very high light of the service, despite the excellence of the vocal numbers. It provides at length a fitting vehicle for the organ to say something patriotic, and it gives the competent organist something worthy to handle. It is to be questioned whether it can be used save on a modern organ, so varied and exacting are its effects and demands.

The exploitation of the American themes has not heretofore found such treatment. To be first in the field with it was quite in Miss Haines' alert resourcefulness. She had also the most elaborate setting of the "Kipling Recessional" so far encountered. A double quartet did it, did it well, and confession is made of its many shades of interest. But it needs centering—something to make those graphic last lines throb majestically at least once. H. A. Matthews is the author.

Victor Herbert's "Call to Freedom" has a finale for soprano and chorus that is brilliant without being florid, the text being particularly good. In all this concerted work the taste and discernment of musical values testified to what Miss Haines stands for. She has an acute sense of refinement, but does not sacrifice vigor and full-blooded intensity for it.

The singing was vital, wide-awake, alive, and yet accented the voice of the inner spirit as well. In many solo moments and in Treharne's "Ye That Have Faith" it was more than good to hear Jennie F. W. Johnson. Her voice is the firm, rich organ we have loved right along, and her wholesome spirit colors and controls her artistic sense in rounding out her musical message. Her presence always inspires pleasure and satisfaction.

A fresh, beautiful voice is the heritage of Louise Brittan, who had ample space on the program. Singularly limpid and even is the tone and it is enlivened by thoughtful touches which bespeak not only culture and study, but the intimate note of reverence and feeling.

The other singers were Naomi Nazor McLain, Florence Halberg, W. T. Mitchell, J. H. Marshall, O. Wilson and R. C. Mulholland.

A novelty of moment was in the prelude, wherein Miss Haines had the assistance of C. L. Cocke, Jr., in an impressive unfolding of Janssen's "Festival Prelude" for four hands and double pedal. To make full measure, Noble's lovely "Solemn Prelude" was added for my pleasure and gratification. In rejoicing in Miss Haines' continued growth and enlargement of musical vision, congratulations cannot be withheld at the physical expansion also. She will have to change her first name if she makes further accretions!

KALAMAZOO, MICH.

The Kalamazoo Musical Society, under whose auspices a most enjoyable recital was heard by this writer earlier in the season, is one of the most important factors in the musical life of Kalamazoo. It is a club of about five hundred members, headed by a most active and efficient president, Mrs. E. C. Wright, the other officers being Mrs. A. L. Waldo, vice president; Mrs. Alfred Curtenius, secretary, and Henry Overly, treasurer.

The principal work of the club consists in the giving of programs for the members of the club and three outside recitals each year. This year the programs have been based on the music of the allied nations—England, America, France, Belgium, Italy, and Russia. The Music Study Club is a branch of the Kalamazoo Musical Club, and during the past year has been doing splendid work.

The three special concerts given under the auspices of the club this season were those given by the Zoellner String Quartet, Saba Doak and Gordon Campbell, and Elizabeth Lennox.

The success of the club is due in large part to the untiring energy and efficiency of the president and her assisting officers.

Miss Rodiger sang the "Samson and Delilah" aria, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," as her first number, then a group of old favorites. Her voice, with its unusually rich charm, reached the back of the immense tent. "Sort of Miss You" is the favorite of the popular songs.

AT YEATMAN GRIFFITH'S STUDIO

By JOSEPH DE VALDOR

During the Spring and early Summer it has been my fortune to visit numberless vocal studios, and naturally they have proven, in turn, good, bad and indifferent.

Some have been so far from what a place for building the human voice should be that it has seemed to me that the Dante saying, "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here," ought, perhaps by law, to be emblazoned across their fronts.

Happily not all are of this kind, however, and among the really fine studios of New York none has been found more charming in hospitality or more intelligent and resourceful in the treatment of the voice than that of Yeatman Griffith, which I recently visited.

When I first entered Mr. Griffith's residence I found myself in an atmosphere rarely to be disclosed in any vocal studio. There was a feeling in the air that here voices are being trained for a real musical career; that the teacher is not only one of the rare personalities in the world of music but that the real principles of vocal pedagogy and practical results are put into the minds and the throats of the students here assembled. To listen to Mr. Griffith's expositions is a rare pleasure. He is not a mere technician; he is not only a theoretician, but also is a practical man whose principles are thought out to the letter.

He was not satisfied to expound his theories; he applied them in practical examples by presenting his pupils in living proof of the excellence of his pedagogy.

I heard a quartet of pupils, each one singing as a real artist should. I noted during the singing that every pupil controlled, in a marvelous manner, the breath. I was delighted with their facile productions of tone. One pupil, a baritone, who had been told by a previous teacher that his voice is a tenor, and who had been set right by Mr. Griffith, proved that he is worthy of public appearance. Under the expert guidance of this splendid pedagogue the young artist has arrived at the point where we may call him an artist. The pupil spoke enthusiastically about Mr. Griffith, and after listening to him I could not doubt that his enthusiasm was warranted. In a rendition of "Eri tu," from "The Masked Ball," and the Prologue from "Pagliacci," Mr. Y. (let me name him so) disclosed a beautiful medium and a clear upper register. Under the proper musical tutelage he has been taught to sing artistically and has been trained to disclose correct interpretation. He shows a marvelous sense of phrasing, a quality rare even with the professional singers.

This pupil of Mr. Griffith will without a doubt climb to the heights of the operatic temples as Florence Macbeth, today a star, has succeeded in reaching them thru the efficient schooling of her worthy pedagogue.

Another pupil, a mezzo-contralto, the most difficult voice to be trained, proved a worthy exponent of the teacher's principles. She is bound to create a furore when she enters the professional field, for she is the possessor of an unusually warm, brilliant and appealing voice. And her schooling is superb; it is the incarnation of her musical tutor.

YEATMAN GRIFFITH WITH HIS PUPILS, FLORENCE MACBETH AND LEONORA SPARKES

Two other pupils disclosed charming voices, one a lyric coloratura and another one a baritone.

The Griffith exercises were explained to me, the axioms of teaching were expounded, and then the pupils were asked to show these in practice. It was a delight to listen to Mr. Griffith and his pupils. In my visits through the studios such wholesome atmosphere has rarely been encountered.

The following quotation from a recent interview with Mr. Griffith gives an inkling of his intelligence and the simplicity of his methods:

"In beginning the study of music one should make sure that the teacher will aim not at the production of effects but rather at the development of a correct and normal manner of using the vocal organ; for without a firm technical and even mechanical foundation no singer is free to produce truly excellent effects.

"The prospective student should not attempt to measure a teacher's abilities by the testimony of the ear alone. The ear can too easily be deluded and tricked into liking sounds produced by methods which in the long run would prove ruinous. Perhaps the safest standard for an absolute novice to go by is the quantity and quality of the singers whom a teacher has trained from the ground up; for if his method is unsound that fact is bound to become evident in the voices whose usage is governed by it.

"The sense of touch is in practice as necessary a guide to good vocal production as the sense of hearing. False methods will quickly betray themselves to even the merest tyro by various abnormal muscular conditions they produce, whether of relaxation or of strain.

"In speaking thus I am not considering man as a machine without mind, but am merely dealing with the vocal mechanism from a common sense point of view, just as an instrumentalist deals with his fingers. In singing, as much as in any other branch of music or of human activity in general, there is a scientific fact to be coped with. Take, as an example, the convention which prescribes that a straight line and only a straight line shall be the symbol for the number 1. You may prefer to use a crooked line, but whatever your preferences in the matter may be you cannot change the fact that a straight line is the only figure recognized by the Arabic system of numerals as the symbol for the number 1. What convention has done in the case of the number nature has done in the case of the vocal organ. So long as the arithmetician has to deal with the Arabic system and the singer with the human voice these scientific facts must form the basis of their respective labors.

MR. AND MRS. YEATMAN GRIFFITH

"Once it is recognized that a certain way of using the diaphragm and the vocal ligaments is the scientifically correct way—which means, incidentally, the simple way—the physical and mental contortions through which many singers are wont to go are summarily brought to a stop. Great singing is a manifestation of intelligence; the instrument with which he sings is the vehicle by which a singer's intelligence is expressed, and if the vehicle is incorrectly used the intelligence will go for nothing. But no restrictions will hamper the singer's intelligence if the instrument is so trained in accordance with scientific fact that it becomes an obedient servant."

ALBERT SPALDING RETURNS TO AMERICA

After an absence of twenty-one months overseas, Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, has returned to his native United States. When we entered the war he was the first American artist to enlist and went across with the initial 60,000 men. Spalding entered as a private in the aviation division and after a brief period in France was transferred to the Italian front, where he was attached to the public information bureau. This work did not appeal to him as a live young American and he sought work in the actual flying section. At Cento Celle, near Rome, he received his aero training, later winning an observer's brevet in night bombing work with Caproni planes.

His familiarity with the Italian language, gained through many years' residence in Florence and numerous concert tours, fitted him especially for much propaganda work throughout Italy and he made frequent speeches in many cities. On one occasion he was sent by the American embassy at Rome to the city of Pesaro as representative of the United States to officiate at the naming of a street after President Wilson.

In a recent interview Mr. Spalding told of interesting meetings with King Victor Emmanuel, General Diaz, Marconi, Orlando, Count D'Annunzio and Toscanini. He dined with the King one evening near the Italian front. In recognition for his many services, the Italian government conferred the "Cross of the Crown of Italy" upon Mr. Spalding. This, by the way, is the highest honor that can be given to a foreign citizen.

This coming season Mr. Spalding will resume his concert work.

MR. VANDERPOOL AND HIS "VALUES"

Frederick Vanderpool continues to receive letters in commendation of his song, "Values." Two of these are appended:

My dear Mr. Vanderpool: Am very glad to hear additional good things of your song "Values." I appreciate its merit, having used it along with, I think, most of your other songs.

Have been acquainted with your works for the past year and find that they are very useful. In fact they are so singable—being so full of flowing melody—that they are invaluable to the student of singing.

Wishing you continued success and trusting to have the pleasure of meeting you personally at some future time, I beg to remain.

Cordially yours,
LOUIS ASCHENFELDER.

New York.

My dear Mr. Vanderpool: I have your inquiry about "Values." I included this, also "I Did Not Know," in a program of all American songs in early March. Since that time I have sung both often and both always please.

Personally I consider "Values" "The Rosary" of today. That means a lot.

Your publishers sent me these two songs and I hope you will write others as good—if you have not already done so. Nearly all my pupils have copies.

All Americans are proud of you!

Sincerely,
(MRS.) REBEKAH ELLISON JOHNSTON.
Jackson, Miss.

PIETRO YON, ORGANIST

With the interest in the forthcoming tour of the noted Italian orchestra from the Academy of Saint Cecilia, it is worthy of note that Pietro Yon, a noted organ virtuoso and composer of distinction, is a graduate of this academy in organ, and was for a long while substitute organist at the Vatican. Mr. Yon has been a resident of the United States for several years, and has developed an unusually brilliant organ repertoire. He has made a number of concert tours, and this year, besides appearing with several of the leading orchestras, will make a tour of more than one hundred cities, many of which have entertained him before. The organ as a recital instrument is relatively unknown in this country, when compared with the number of concerts given with other instruments, but Mr. Yon, and later Mr. Bonnet, the noted French organist, appear to have revived this interest considerably.

If "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing," what shall be said of one who gives false news through total ignorance?

A commentator in a widely read musical journal, speaking of Italy and Italian music and musicians, declared that the relations between Italians and Americans in Rome and other Italian cities were so strained that American soliders dared not wear their uniform in Rome, and that the Stars and Stripes were significantly absent in all Italian cities. The implication was clear, and yet the facts are the opposite. American soldiers mingle freely with Italian soldiers and citizens, and the same fraternal spirit is now manifest as has been since the two countries shouldered arms and marched against and annihilated the common foe.

"It is unfortunate that erroneous matter such as this should be given wide publicity," declares Pietro Yon, the celebrated Italian organ virtuoso, teacher, composer and noted musician. "The days, happily just passed, have been strenuous ones for the peace delegates, and it is not surprising that tempers waxed wrothy and the vigor of debate became keener than usual. But that the relations between Italians and Americans are strained is making a mountain out of a mole-hill indeed. The best evidence of that fact is that the American press has accorded a hearty reception to the published statement that the famous Saint Cecilia Orchestra of Rome, the society, by the way, from which I graduated, is to make a protracted tour of the United States. If the warmth of the reception to this orchestra, when it really comes, is to be marked by the present hearty editorial reception, it will leave no doubt in the mind of anyone that Italy and this country have too much in common, that we are too close to each other sentimentally, socially and artistically, to permit any temporary misunderstanding to terminate the good feeling."

Mr. Yon himself, with more than one hundred organ concerts booked for next season, with the knowledge that he is one of Italy's most interesting and distinguished artists, furnishes unmistakable evidence that there is no thought of an international rupture in musical circles.

Dana's Musical Institute—Fiftieth Anniversary Commencement—Jubilee "Hop"—Annual Picnic—Reunion of Old Classes—Memorial Hall Planned in Honor of Professor W. H. Dana

REVIEWED BY MARY CARVER WILLIAMS

Dana's Musical Institute, founded fifty years ago by Professor W. H. Dana, is located in what has at some time been called the prettiest town in the United States. Perhaps the late arrival of steel mills and other manufacturing industries has deprived it of some of its former picturesqueness, for it has certainly grown with immense rapidity in the last few years. And still, notwithstanding the ravages of sudden growth, it appeals to the chronicler as one of the most attractive spots she has visited. The D. M. I., as all those familiar with it like to call Dana's Musical Institute, is centrally located. The three allied buildings stand side by side; the home of Professor Lynn B. Dana, now president of the school, the main building, containing the concert hall, class and practice rooms, and the girls' dormitory, formerly the Martha Potter Hall, now taken over by the Y. W. C. A.

The Faculty

Lynn B. Dana, F. C. M., president and teacher of piano; J. D. Cook, L. C. M., secretary and treasurer and teacher of woodwind instruments; J. A. Schmitt, L. C. Commencement Programs

The commencement recitals took place in the afternoon and evening of Tuesday, June 17. The plan of the school has always been the playing of a standard concerto by the graduating student, with orchestral accompaniment, if the graduate is in the piano department. Queerly and naturally enough, this year the class was made up exclusively of piano students, and also exclusively of young women, the war having prevented all the men from completing the course this year. The grade of work done by the graduates was exceedingly high and each girl proved herself artistically equipped for future musical work.

melodic Capriccio Brilliante (Mendelssohn) possessed a good, sustaining touch and unusual melodic tone.

Miss Chicoine, in the Saint-Saens Rhapsodie D'Auvergne, revealed splendid technic and an imagination equal to the requirements of her piece.

Miss Smootz was both conscientious and innately artistic in her reading of the Saint-Saens Concerto, Opus 22. These three numbers constituted the afternoon's program, a very auspicious forerunner of the one which followed.

Six soloists appeared in the evening. The first was Grace Shattuck in the Beethoven C Major Concerto, the Rondo movement. Miss Shattuck played with an abandon and ease which was nothing short of bewitching, and her interpretation showed force of personality as well as musicianship.

Miss Weber chose the Scherzo movement of the Saint-Saens, Opus 22, and carried it off with a stunning sense of rhythm and a rare interpretative insight.

Miss Thexton, in the exquisite Godard Allegro, displayed excellent tone and ample power, along with a surprising flexibility in her technic.

Miss Hodgkin was rhythm and accent to the very core. And her playing was artistic and, beyond that, scholarly, which is a great asset to the musician and teacher. She chose for her piece the Weber Concerto in C, which is more demanding of the artist in many ways, built, as it is, on more conventional lines.

The playing which showed perhaps the most maturity and the largest background of thought was that of Miss Bloch in the Godard A Minor Concerto. At the same time it was not lacking in temperament or brilliance.

One would expect the most brilliant performance probably in the "Ruins of Athens" March (Beethoven-Liszt), at the close of the program. And one would not have been disappointed at the hands of Miss Hicks. For she swept all before her in the sparkle of her technic and her clear, forceful grasp of the stupendous passage work.

The orchestra, under Mr. Dana's direction, furnished admirable accompaniments and seemed perfectly adaptable to the mood of all the compositions, which followed each other in such rapid succession.

LYNN B. DANA

In the conferring of the degrees, a diploma was also presented to Miss Geraldine Knapp of Gerard, Ohio, for completion of the work in the dramatic art department, newly established this year. Miss Knapp, however, did not appear in the program, having given her own graduating recital at a previous date.

Alumni Plan Memorial

At the alumni banquet there was made public the plan for a memorial hall in honor of the late Professor W. H. Dana, founder of Dana's Musical Institute. Drawings are being made for the hall, which will seat between two and three thousand people, and will have a large pipe organ.

This building is to be erected in the near future and will form the center of a group of D. M. I. buildings. It is not unlikely that this and other additions will some day fit Warren to become the permanent home of the Ohio State Music Teachers' Association, just as Lockport is the logical seat of the National American Music Festival.

A temporary committee, composed of Mrs. Marion Kelly of Niles, author of the idea, Professor L. B. Dana and Professor Ross Hickernell, was appointed at the banquet, which was attended by sixty former graduates. It was announced that five people of "independent means" are to sponsor this project.

Orchestra Program

The closing program of the commencement week was given by the school orchestra. The most remarkable feature of this event was, to me, that this was not a program which had been worked up for months in advance, as one would think, for it is the orchestra's custom to give a program of this caliber every Wednesday night. This is not only remarkable, but almost an unheard-of feat for a purely unprofessional body of players. The orchestral numbers consisted of the Mozart Symphony in E flat and the Ivanof Caucasian Sketches, which were played with due understanding of their unique atmosphere.

In addition to this, there were several solos. Professor Ross Hickernell played the "Una voc poco fa" aria on the cornet, with the results which could be achieved by no one but a supreme artist. He was called back and for an encore added a delicate bit of sentiment to the occasion by playing Schubert's Serenade, the first piece which he had studied sixteen years ago with Professor H. Clark Thayer, who was in the audience as a visitor.

The well-known Grieg Concerto (A minor) was played by a third-year student, Earl Shisler, who has only been out of military service about two months. Mr. Shisler displayed an infallible memory and great promise for a future career.

Two trios were also done, the first of more interesting content than the second, but both executed with good ensemble and verve. The first, the Schubert E flat, was done by Miss Hicks, Mr. Lowry and Mr. Ruhl. Miss Hicks was less aggressive, proportionately, in her solo work, but impeccable in her technic.

The Weidig Trio, in D minor, was also done by Messrs. Shisler (viola), Slama and Ruhl, with adequate finish and enthusiasm.

Immediately following the program the orchestra struck up the D. M. I. March, written by a student of the school to the theme of the Dana School whistle. It was most stimulating, so much so that it roused the alumni to a live demonstration of their repressed spirits in the form of songs and yells dug up from the dim recesses of the past.

A Hop and a Bat

Commencement festivities at the D. M. I. neither began nor ended with concerts. On the opening night this writer arrived on the scene just in time to be escorted to the Fiftieth Anniversary Jubilee Hop, which was held in the armory, and which, in spite of the intense heat, proved anything but slow. Here it was that all came in their best togs and rubbed elbows with professors emeritus, newspaper reporters, and revivified graduates.

But, speaking of rubbing elbows, this performance was outstripped by the operation performed on shins at the picnic on Thursday, which was held in a most dangerous location, known as Nelson Ledges. Not that there is anything in the name to suggest adventure. But immediately upon investigation romance begins with the discovery of Devil's Dens and Dining Rooms, Old Maids' Kitchens and Fat Men's Miseries. In case any of my readers become puzzled at these terms, I would suggest that they accompany Mr. Dana some time on one of his personally conducted tours through the "Ledges."

It was with many regrets, and hopes for a return another year that the writer bade farewell to the D. M. I., where was to be found an ample portion of good, solid work, happily seasoned with wholesome fun and good fellowship.

Thirty-second Annual Festival Convention of the Michigan Music Teachers' Association—A Five-Day Meeting of Continuous Interest—Community Chorus and Orchestra of Great Prominence—A Unique Out-of-Door Festival Pageant—Performance of "The Crusaders" and the "Stabat Mater"—Distinguished Soloists and Speakers—Generous Entertainment Through the St. Cecilia Society—A Live and Growing Center for a Meeting Place

Great Song and Light Festival

One of the outstanding features of the Michigan State Teachers' Convention, in the mind of the chronicler, is the unprecedented success of the unique Song and Light Festival, which was given on the opening night at Thread Lake Park. It offered a remarkable opportunity to the public to come and enjoy an evening of good music free of charge and in the most picturesque surroundings.

A large pond in the park was bordered by a splendid natural amphitheater with fine acoustics and seating capacity for thousands. The shore was lighted by Japanese lanterns, to which were added sparklers and red lights, set off at intervals to aid the spectacle. A panorama of canoes and rowboats stationed in different parts of the pond made the whole scene most artistic. Two bands were placed at one end of the shore, one on either bank, playing intermittently, and at the opposite end was seated on a large grand stand Flint's famous Community Chorus. This chorus is made up of several hundred employes from the different factories in this manufacturing center, who sang a varied program under the direction of George Oscar Bowen, community song leader of Flint. One of the most impressionable numbers was the "Blue Danube Waltz," which was done with splendid fervor and well-knit ensemble.

Other attractive features of the evening were a soprano solo sung from one of the boats in the lagoon, which carried perfectly to the farthest points of the amphitheater, and another a dance given by a seven-year-old boy on a platform in the center of the pond. Accompanied as he was from the shore and with a stage which was none too smooth for dancing, he made a profound and unique impression. He was costumed as a fire-fly, with tiny electric lights flashing from his costume as he danced.

Many thousands of people attended the concert. The park benches were filled to capacity, and hundreds were standing to enjoy this beautiful entertainment.

Reception and Sight-Seeing Trip

On Tuesday the morning was given over to the registration of new members and a general get-acquainted gathering. In the afternoon the visitors were taken in automobiles on a delightful sight-seeing expedition through the city of Flint. The town is more than a mere manufacturing center. It proved itself a city of lovely homes and cordial people. The latter was demonstrated in the form of a reception at the home of Mrs. C. S. Mott, given by the St. Cecilia Society.

The visitors were graciously entertained by Mr. Nils Boson of Flint with an organ concert, following which they visited the beautiful gardens, where refreshments were served.

Board of Commerce Banquet

Dining and feting, however, did not stop with the functions of the afternoon, for the Flint Board of Commerce very generously entertained the guests of the convention with a banquet in the evening. The occasion was an added link in the unusual chain of events which went to make the Flint convention so successful. Toasts were given by the president of the Chamber of Commerce and by Mr. Dort of the Dort Motor Company, through whose generous support much of the convention and its activities were made possible. A pleasant reply of gratitude was made by Mrs. William S. Rowe of Grand Rapids, president of the Teachers' Association.

EFFA ELLIS PERFIELD

"The Crusaders"

On Tuesday evening one of the most important events of the convention took place. This was the giving of Gade's "The Crusaders" by the St. Cecilia Club, the Community Chorus, the Community Orchestra, and special soloists, under the direction of George Oscar Bowen; Nils Boson, accompanist. The soloists were Frances Ingram, contralto; John Koneezny, tenor, and Harold Land, baritone, of New York City, and the parts were all well taken.

The chorus was in splendid trim, with a number of good foundation voices and a superstructure of several hundred to make up the enormous body of singers who furnished the background for the piece. One sometimes wonders if the chorus is not the most important item of the performance, and indeed in this particular piece and on this occasion it seemed to be. It gave just the zest, together with the acumen of musicianship, needed to make "The Crusaders," as it should be, one of the most poignant and impressive cantatas in all musical literature.

Mr. Bowen was masterful in his control of the people, and Mr. Boson at the piano gave unstinted support, as did also the orchestra. That these two men could take a perfectly raw orchestra and an amateur chorus and weld them in a few weeks into an organization of the calibre displayed on Tuesday night was nothing short of miraculous. And this was not to be all, for the Stabat Mater was in store for later in the week.

The only weak point about the program was its length, which was very perceptibly misdetermined. The first half of the program was given by local musicians, members of the St. Cecilia Club. Mrs. Harry Weingarden sang a group including Horsman's "Bird of the Wilderness," "Break, Break, Break" (Homer), and "Synove's Lied" (Kjesulf), and Mrs. Charles H. Bonbright played the Chopin Polonaise in E Flat, displaying a brilliant technic and a wealth of musical feeling. She graciously responded to an encore.

"The Blessed Damozel," with chorus and a double quartet, might well have been omitted, although it was given with ample understanding. The solo part was taken very successfully by Mrs. Eva Remington-Lee, the rest of the voices being Miss Martha Baker, Mrs. Raymond Williams, Mrs. W. H. Winchester, Mrs. Alena Green-Cooke, Miss Daisy Ann Thompson, Mrs. Harry Winegarden, and Miss Vivian Tripp.

The program as a whole was a pronounced success and spoke well for the interest of all concerned.

Effa Ellis Perfield Talk

A talk by Mrs. Effa Ellis Perfield on "The Old and New Pedagogy" was the feature of Wednesday morning's program. She not only gave ample food for thought to many of the teachers present, but aroused many to enthusiasm over her method, which has undoubtedly achieved some wonderful results within the last few years. She defined the old pedagogy as the orthodox pedagogy, that which has stopped growing and that which is forced from without instead of felt from within. She believes in combining "inner feeling," reasoning and drills to make a workable trinity for the teacher and child, and inner feeling is to be approached through three channels, the eye, the ear, and the touch. She also made a distinct difference between the definitions of "reasoning" and of "understanding," and illustrated how she develops reasoning from within by the means of reasoning stories. Then the "drills," she says, are as far from drills in the ordinary sense as possible. They are not to make the pupil do things, but merely to satisfy the teacher that the pupil has the inner feeling and reasoning which the teacher has been trying to draw out.

Mrs. Perfield also claims that the teaching of music should begin, not with scales, but with chords. "We should stress," she argued, "ear feeling, not ear training."

Then rhythm should be taught in groups from the very beginning. Fractions should be avoided absolutely beyond the fact that two halves make a whole.

The summing up and the trend of her whole talk was "keep the channel of self-expression wide open." This in itself is enough to impress one with the fact that here is a woman of thoroughly modern and progressive thinking, and one who knows whereof she speaks.

The following is an extract quoted from a similar talk which Mrs. Perfield gave in the East a short time previously:

Pedagogy is the science of presentation.

Pedagogy, in order to be constructive, must enable a teacher to classify material and present it so that the pupil makes it his own.

Let us consider the development of pedagogy.

The old school PRESENTED nothing. The pupil was assigned a lesson in the book, he labored to UNDERSTAND the printed reasoning, next he memorized it, and finally repeated it to the teacher in answer to certain questions.

This did not develop individualism. It stored up facts. Many pupils left the school and the conservatory with knowledge, but without initiative to meet the problems of life.

The pedagogue in this stage said, "I believe in bringing out, but I believe the thing must be put in before it can be brought out."

Some did not even "finish" their "school eduaction." Why? Because the strained effort to understand closed the channel of self-expression and the pupil suffered from a nervous breakdown. Only poor pedagogy can create such a result.

From this drill stage of pedagogy the pendulum swung to the other extreme and we found the teachers who had suffered from forced drill presenting "FEELING" and feeling only. It is better to use the "DRILL" pedagogy than only the "feeling" pedagogy.

What is the result of this presentation? The pupil has a perfectly lovely time feeling, FEELING, FEELING, but he never knows what he feels and he is not creative.

The worst forms of the "feeling" pedagogy are:

Hypnotism.

Mental Suggestion.

Strict Imitation or Parrot-like Repetition.

When a pupil does "perfectly lovely" work with the teacher but "slumps" at home then BEWARE.

When the pupil "plays just like the master" BEWARE.

When the pupil has no initiative and gains inspiration only from suggestion BEWARE.

From this extreme we find the pedagogue trying to bring feeling and reasoning together. But when the feeling is from WITHIN and the reasoning is from WITHOUT the result is the same as trying to mix water with oil.

Later the pedagogue said, "We must not give a pupil, in one lesson, any more than he can grasp and retain."

This might have been successful if the teacher had known how much the pupil could grasp and retain in one lesson.

The teacher in this stage says, "I will teach a song containing quarter notes, eighth notes and half notes. I will present only these because the pupil will not use any others for a long time (he certainly will not use them if he does not develop them). From this song the pupil will learn these note values."

In this the teacher makes the application instead of the pupil.

If the pupil had the note values presented to him through the scientific pedagogy of inner feeling, reasoning and drills through his ear, eye and touch he would make the application not only to the one song, but to all songs.

The teacher must not limit the pupil. He has no way of estimating what the pupil is ready to make his own. The teacher should teach from principle, enlarge the vision through feeling and self-expression and leave it to the pupil to take what is nearest to him.

Some believe that "feeling without reasoning" is not disastrous in the first few years of a pupil's development. They argue that the pupil, especially the music pupil, should sing and sing and sing, play and play and play and enjoy the emotional side of music without learning details.

That is a sane argument if the teacher only knows how to present details as mere facts. If we analyze psychologically the development of a child out of the school room and the studio we find that feeling, reasoning and drills work as a trinity.

The child feels hungry, it reasons what it wants to eat, and it completes the drill.

The child learns a chair through feeling, reasoning and drill, hence it cannot remember when it learned a chair. It was not a case of MEMORY. It was ear, eye and touch working together in self-expression. He did not use a chair, of his own free will, for months before he associated the name and form.

The important thing in the scientific pedagogy is to teach the principle of a thing and not the limited application of a small amount of material.

The pupil that really knows note values through feeling and reasoning sees the vision of every note value that is possible. He selects his own material and makes his own application. He hears what he sees, sees what he hears, and hears and sees what he touches.

The pupil that really reads through principle is not limited to treble staff notation. He sees the vision of staff notation that he could apply to a staff as great as from here to China.

The pupil that hears, sees and expresses chords from principle is not limited to the keys of seven sharps and seven flats. His vision is so great that he has perfect freedom in the use of his material.

How is the pupil benefited by the scientific pedagogical training?

First—His whole development is made orderly and harmonious.

Second—He develops initiative, individuality.

Third—He develops reasoning and meets the problem of life without fear.

Wednesday Afternoon

A lecture on "Americanization Through Music," by Anne Shaw Oberndorfer, opened the afternoon session. She began by saying, "The supreme development of our art and music is ahead of us," and from this glowing forecast went on to eulogize the wealth of folk song of every nation which has for years been growing up in our midst, and of which we are only too little aware—the folk song of the immigrants in this great "melting pot" of nations. She went on to say that in the Americanization of our foreigners we must get at them through the folk songs of their own nations, the songs that they love, and we must give them English translations as literal as possible. Too often translators, looking toward good meter and rhyme, make translations which do not fit the music or change the original sense entirely, thus making it of no use to the foreigner.

It is the only way we will be able to build up a national music. Bach conceived the idea of using the folk songs of all nations upon which to build German music, and all great composers have done so. But people settled in Germany because they had to, not because they wanted to. That is all the more reason why our national music should be better and freer. Our national music should not rest alone on Indian or Negro music, but upon an amalgamation of the music of all nations.

In the absence of Charles W. Clark, who was scheduled to sing, Harold Land of New York gave an impromptu recital, which, by the way, was done with a great deal of finish and good poise. He did such old favorites as "Hear Me, Ye Winds and Waves," "Bois Epais," "The Hour," "Plaisis D'Amour," Massenet's "Elegie," "Values" (Vanderpool), "The Trumpeter," and others.

An interesting item on Wednesday afternoon was a demonstration given by Miss Hazel Stanton of Dr. Seashore's experiments with and measurements of musical talent. These experiments are performed by the means of phonograph records and different attributes of musical talent are measured, such as pitch, intensity, consonance, acuity, imagery of the auditory, visual and motor sort, memory and others.

NELL STEWART SAVILLE
Pupil of Anna Louise Gillies

Dr. Seashore has done much with this work at the Universtiy of Iowa, Iowa City, and is at present publishing a book, "The Psychology of Musical Talent," which will undoubtedly prove some interesting things with regard to differences in fundamental musical abilities and aptitudes in people. Two of the experiments which were tried on the gathering present were most interesting.

An Evening of Chamber Music

The following program was given on Wednesday evening by Andre Polah, one of the greatest violinists ever heard by this writer; Phillip Abbas of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and Margaret Mannebach, one of Detroit's distinguished accompanists:

Concerto, E minor.....Mendelssohn
Allegro molto Appassionata; Andante
Allegro molto Vivace
Mr. Polah

Sonate .....Locatelli (1693-1764)
Allegro; Adagio; Menuetto con Variationi
Mr. Abbas

Trio, Op. 49, D minor.....Mendelssohn
Andante con moto; Molto Allegro ed Agitato
Mr. Polah, Mr. Abbas, Miss Mannebach

Evening Song .....Schumann
The Fountain .....Davidoff
Mr. Abbas

Aria .....Gluck-Kreisler
Serenade .....Saint-Saens
Rondino .....Vieuxtemps
Mr. Polah

The program was remarkably well chosen, not too long, and done with perfect artistry and finish. It brought the audience together in a most intimate way, as only chamber music can do, music of the stamp played on this program.

Mr. Polah is a violinist of the first rank, a Belgian by birth and possessing that peculiar warmth and tenderness of feeling inherent in the artists of his nationality. And with it all he was not lacking in verve or brilliance of technic. At every point he showed himself an artist of splendid preparation and exquisite refinement of thought.

Philip Abbas was clearly a cellist of personality and superior musicianship. He played with good tone and a wealth of technical display.

Margaret Mannebach, who, it must not be forgotten, accompanied Mr. Land's impromptu recital in the afternoon with splendid understanding, accomplished quite as wonderful a feat in the evening, for she won her audience completely before the evening was well begun by her gracious manner and supreme insight into the art of ensemble playing. Seldom has this writer heard an artist more appreciative and alert to the finer nuances of chamber music.

After the program a delightful informal party was given at the home of Dr. William Clift, where a number of guests were privileged to meet the artists, and where many funny stories were swapped between swallows of coffee.

Michigan Composers' Program

The program of the works of Michigan composers is printed below, as given Thursday morning. It was a program well worth hearing and representative of a great deal of talent among Michigan musicians. And there were many not represented. Names such as those of Eric De Lamarter and Leo Sowerby occurred to this writer.

Mr. Stevenson is a writer of temperament and originality. His piano numbers were especially attractive.

The Rossetter Cole Sonata for Piano and Violin was satisfactorily presented by two young Detroit artists.

In the place of Mr. Veatch, whose name is printed on the program, Mrs. Michaelson sang again, giving some of Maria Lund's interesting and attractive children's lyrics. Miss Lund is an innately gifted writer, a pupil, by the way, of Leo Sowerby.

Mr. Matheys played a violin concerto of his own composition, and proved himself a writer of no mean ability of the more conventional school. The general trend of thinking, however, leads to the more modern school, and this thought may be traced through all the states in programs of this kind.

Public School Music

The most important talk on Public School Music was given on Thursday afternoon by Ralph Baldwin of Hartford, Conn., though this subject was referred to later by Mr. Dykema in his lecture on Community Music.

Mr. Baldwin's plea was for the rousing of the general public from its present state of apathy toward music in the public schools. He discussed the influence of Community and Public School Music on the emotional steadiness and the cultural growth of a community. He used in illustration a potent quotation from Matthew Arnold: "Culture is acquainting ourselves with the best that the world has done and said, and thus with the history of the human spirit." In this way, he said, we should cultivate a real, sincere appreciation of music in this country.

Recital by State Musicians

The recital by state musicians was given in the afternoon of the same day and was a most enjoyable affair, refreshing because there was a great variety of personality and talent displayed. An effort was made to have representative musicians from various parts of the state, and this effort was well repaid, for the soloists were equally interesting, coming from Hillsdale, Litchfield, Grand Rapids, Lansing, Detroit, and Albion.

Thursday Evening

On Thursday evening a piano recital of great beauty was played by Ernest Hutcheson of New York. Appended is his well-chosen program:

So popular was Mr. Hutcheson's playing that at the end of the program he was recalled many times and compelled to respond to several encores.

Friday Morning Session

The Friday morning session was unfortunately not heard by this correspondent, but from all reports it was one of the most enjoyable features of the week.

Round tables were conducted for piano, voice and violin, the directing force being Francis I. York of Detroit, who, it may not be amiss to note, was elected President of the association for next year.

A lecture on "The Future of Community Music" was delivered by Professor Peter Dykema of Madison, Wis. To call this a lecture is rather too formal a term for this intimate, friendly chat, through which people were convinced of the sincerity of the speaker and the broad background of his experience, which made what he said so much worth while.

Stabat Mater

The climax of the convention was reached in Friday evening's performance of the "Stabat Mater," which, so far as the chorus and the orchestra were concerned, was a repetition of the success of Tuesday night.

The quartet was made up of American singers of the New York vintage and was splendid individually and in its larger make-up.

The following program was given by the individual members before the oratorio:

Macushla ..... MacMurrough
The Bitterness of Love ..... Dunn
The Foggy Dew ..... Fox

The chorus did remarkably well with the climactic effects of the "Stabat Mater" and with the finer shadings, of which this great piece is so full, and in spite of the Latin verbiage gave definite spiritual meaning to the composition as a whole.

A final reception to the guests of the convention at the home of Mrs. Bonbright brought my stay in Flint to an enjoyable and long-to-be-remembered close.

Enough cannot be said for the hard work done to make this convention a success, and this may be attributed in large degree to the following officers:

Mrs. William S. Rowe, President, Grand Rapids.
Mrs. Kate Marvin Kedzie, Vice-President, Lansing.
J. G. Cummings, Secretary, Saginaw.
Melville W. Chase, Treasurer, Hillsdale.
S. E. Clark, Auditor, Detroit.

Program Committee—Mrs. C. A. Donaldson, Chairman, Grand Rapids; Mrs. Eugene Woodhams, Litchfield; Miss Marguerite Kortlander, Grand Rapids; Miss Anna Louise Gillies, Flint; Francis Mayhew, Detroit.

Membership Committee—Francis L. York, Chairman, Detroit; Guy B. Williams, Detroit; H. A. Milliken, Bay City.

Local Executive Committee—George Oscar Bowen, General Chairman; Mrs. Harry Winegarden, Vice Chairman; Mrs. Howard A. Field, Mrs. J. G. Warrick, Mrs. M. W. Clift, Mrs. J. C. King, George Perry, Mrs. W. H. Winchester, Mrs. Charles H. Bonbright, Mrs. Alena Green-Cooke, Miss Daisy Ann Thompson, Nils Boson, W. H. Hoffman.

An Interesting Flint Musician

It was chiefly through the efforts of a most progressive and influential musician of Flint that this wonderful festival convention was made possible there for this year. Miss Anna Louise Gillies is a singer of artistic standing and a teacher of broad sympathies and high pedagogic abilities. Miss Gillies has been a church singer for many years in choirs in Toledo, Bay City, and Flint. She was at one time a member of the Heberlein Concert Company, together with Herman Heberlein, cellist, and Katherine Ruth Heyman. Her first concerts were given in Boston. She was also out with other companies for two years in recital work.

At present she occupies an enviable position as teacher of voice in Flint. Besides this she is doing a work of a very unique character—the teaching of the Irish harp. This old harp, which is less complicated than the ordinary harp, and smaller, she is teaching to children, with great success. It is a splendid method of teaching fundamental harmony to the child, and the artisticness of it is so attractive that children from five years old up are perfectly fascinated by it and practice with a real love for it.

Miss Gillies is exceedingly tactful and winning in her contact with children, as seen by this writer in the witnessing of one lesson, and the children are very fond of her. It is to be hoped that Miss Gillies' introduction of the harp study in Flint will not end there, but be carried to many parts of the country, where such a study would be needed and welcome.

CHICAGO PIANO COLLEGE

The Chicago Piano College has an unusually fine arrangement of space so that by the simple opening of a few doors and the arranging of a lot of extra chairs the teaching rooms are converted into an attractive little auditorium.

It was delightfully cool there on Tuesday evening last and there was present a goodly and thoroughly appreciative audience.

The occasion was a piano recital by Kathryne A. Turner, an advanced pupil of Eleanor F. Godfrey, the latter playing not only the second piano part of the Henselt Concerto, but also acting as accompanist for Irene Hackmeister, a well poised and well trained young soprano from the vocal class of Jane Polson Spearin, who did musically attractive and technically clear work in three songs.

Miss Turner is a pianist to whom the appellation of "honest" applies specifically. She makes an earnest effort to do everything just right, she does not allow temperament to run away with good judgment and she plays each number with exactitude and well thought-out shading.

These are assets which will, unquestionably, eventuate in fine success and have already led Miss Turner into the path of pleasant piano playing and nice interpretations.

The Grieg Sonata was unusually definite and clear—the Concerto was well done and the smaller pieces full of meaning and color.

EFFA ELLIS PERFIELD

Announcement is made in another column in this issue that Effa Ellis Perfield will give her special piano lesson, covering one year's work for the beginner, on Monday, July 14, at the studio in the McClurg Building, between the hours of 9 and 11 a. m.

Only teachers are admitted to this class.

This lesson shows how to eliminate tenseness, without the bad effect caused by the wrong use of the term relaxation.

The beginner at once uses tone color. He is able to compare quality of tones. He chooses the touch needed for the effect wanted.

All effects are produced by three technical exercises, based on inner-feeling, reasoning, and drills, through the ear, eye, and touch.

Holmquist-Blackmore—Gustaf Holmquist and John J. Blackmore will appear in joint recital at the Bush Conservatory on July 12 at 3:30.

Hadley—Grant Hadley of Chicago is one of the soloists at the Methodist Centenary at Columbus, Ohio, from July 1 to 14.

Still a German Orchestra

Editor Journal: You remember the ruction in the Chicago Orchestra about a year ago, caused by the trial for disloyalty of a half dozen players (necessarily members of the musicians' union), and the dropping of those men from the union?

You remember the announcement by the orchestra management that these men were "automatically discharged from the orchestra"—not, mind you, because of disloyalty, but because the union had dropped them.

The latest news, Mr. Editor, is that the process of taking back these disloyal men has begun; that two, at least, of them have been put to work, and that about a dozen good Americans have been discharged.

You remember the protestations of the trustees, that the orchestra musicians were and are all good and true Americans; that the leader was "passionately" fond of America; passionately desirous of being a citizen; you also remember that he resigned (wise guy), but was received back at least ninety days before he had completed the process of rehabilitation, displacing thereby the artist, gentleman and scholar who had been filling his former place.

The truth is (the trustees to the contrary notwithstanding) that the leader and his "man Friday" have "no use for" the American, the Briton, the Frenchman, the Italian—when a German can be found; that in the recent "shakeup," in which about a dozen men lost their places, the loyalists were the "shining mark" for the guillotine; and the two renegades thus far reinstated were the loudest disloyalists of all those "let out" a year ago.

The truth is that the trustees (and that means the trustees for the 8,500 people whose contributions built Orchestra Hall—a property worth nearly $3,000,000—for a pension fund of nearly $300,000, and for other bequests, not yet available in money, of nearly another million)—the trustees either do not know or do not care whether the musicians are loyal Americans or not.

Oh! for another Bryan Lathrop, who, as president of the association, gave lavishly of thought, time and money, with no hope of a money return, but solely for the "greatest good to the greatest number" o music loving Chicagoans.—Simeon F. Newhall in the Chicago Journal of June 26, 1919.

"Tales of Hoffman" at Ravinia

While there is an enthusiasm spontaneously generated by a great audience such as gathers at Ravinia Park on Saturdays and Sundays, there is a more intimate pleasure to be obtained on weekday evenings, when, in a manner of speaking, you have a little more elbow room. Doubtless the management is quite satisfied when the "standing room only" sign is displayed, but on a warm summer evening it is agreeable to drift out to the park in a leisurely sort of manner, stop for a friendly chat and take your time about getting seated. What do we care about a few extra dollars compared with our comfort?

"The Tales of Hoffman" makes delightful entertainment for this same warm summer evening. The music sounds surprisingly fresh out in the open, though a bit thin for $5.50, white kids and all the rest of the regular winter regalia. Up at the park you don't have to take it seriously, but can enjoy a good tune without fearing that the taste of the public will be corrupted unless you solemnly point out to them that it is not great music. The atmosphere of the park aids one in the enjoyment of the lighter things, the mere fact of the green grass growing all around makes a splendid melody sound natural and the pleasure it gives quite proper. Ravinia Park helps clear a lot of nonsense from our head, for we get intellectually beany with all the art stuff of the winter.—Karleton Hackett in the Chicago Evening Post.

Truth in a Nutshell

Artists who leave New York for the summer season to rusticate in the mountains or by the shore of the sea make a mistake in believing that the fall, winter and spring will take care of themselves. Publicity, advertising, managers' contracts and all matters of kindred nature should be attended to fully and systematically before the warm weather begins, and then the holiday weeks will be doubly appreciated, perfect relaxation prevailing. Truth in a nutshell in reference to concert and operatic engagements is found in the fact that procrastination often is the cause of failure.—Musical Advance.

Cadets' Choir Will Tour

Plans for the organizing of a boys' choir which will take an extended concert trip after school next year were discussed recently by Major W. L. Ganssle and George W. Barnes, musical director of St. John's School. School had been in session for some time when Mr. Barnes came last year and the schedule was so arranged that he had to hold his rehearsals at night. This did not prove entirely satisfactory. A definite time each morning has now been set for rehearsals. Mr. Barnes will select twenty-four boys, both large and small, from among the best voices in the cadet corps next fall and concentrate on the training of these in concert work. Mr. Barnes has specialized in choral work and has had several successful concert seasons with boys' choirs before coming to St. John's.—The Skirmisher, Salina, Kan.

Gifted with a voice of most pleasing quality, Parish Williams also possesses that temperament which, for want of a better word, is known as artistic. That quality more than often allows Williams to be in full sympathy with the composer.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Herbert Gould

Herbert Gould, employed by the Navy Department in promoting social affairs and leading sings for navy men, is now detailed to the Mississippi, where he has already made himself secure in the hearts of the bluejackets and officers. His voice has tremendous range and power, and unlike any other man engaged in such work among the men of the fleet, has already accomplished remarkable results in maintaining morale and good fellowship. A "singing navy" has long been advocated by military and naval men and other acquisitions like Mr. Gould will be sure to attain this ultimate result.—The Virginia Pilot, June 22, 1919.

Kanders—Helene Kanders, the most attractive and sensationally talented soprano, whose recital at Carnegie Hall in New York last season was one of the outstanding musical events, is to make a tour of the important cities of the United States east of Chicago this year. Miss Kanders is one of the restricted group of artists who, alone and unaided, filled Carnegie Hall to the uttermost and won unstinted critical praise from the critics of the metropolis as well.

BAKER'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF MUSICIANS

(Third Revised Edition)

(Published by G. Schirmer, New York)

Baker's Dictionary, contrary to the usual price of dictionaries, will cost you only a comparatively small amount, and is one within the reach of the most modest musician. No one will attempt to compare Baker's with Grove's—the latter is more authoritative—but Baker's will fill the gap excellently. I have examined Baker's volume, page after page, and where Grove doesn't mention Georges Enesco, the Roumanian violinist-composer, Baker contains his biography. Another pleasant discovery was our collaborator's biography, Herbert J. Wrightson. Why does Mr. Baker classify composers. In many of his biographies Mr. X is a dramatic composer and Mr. Y is a lyric one. You may indicate the branch of composition—song, opera, oratorio, etc.—but many a composer has written both lyric and dramatic music. It is a faulty classification.

Among the celebrities, Mr. Baker has given many places of honor to singers who were mere singers. If he wished to enlighten the world, then Mr. Baker has missed many a greater singer than Mr. Z and Mr. W. Some dates are erroneous; certain musicians have died, but the volume, printed in 1918, does not mention this.

With all the shortcomings, which may be remedied later, Mr. Baker's book deserves to be in everybody's library. To us it is invaluable.

A Brief Visit — Two Interesting Recitals — Music at the Art Museum — A Garden Party — Some Sterling Musicians

Reviewed by MARY CARVER WILLIAMS

Of all beautiful places to visit, Toledo impressed me as being one of the most, if not the most, attractive. It is a city of wide avenues, with beautiful big trees, lovely homes and parks, and impressive public buildings. And there was that peculiar combination of feeling in the air, the bustle of a large city, together with the cordiality and ease of a small town, which made my stay there very delightful.

Mary Willing Meagley

One of Toledo's most prominent musicians, whose activities were going on while I was there, is Mary Willing Meagley. Her piano pupils have done some remarkable things during the past year, so that she has been able to present them in a series of eight recitals between June 6 and June 25. The pupils thus presented were Elizabeth Anderson, Mildred Harvey, Kathleen Doyle, Colleen Maloney, Herma Schweitzer, Ethel Kimbell, Ruth Brand, Ruth Siek and Charlotte Wean, besides a class recital by junior pupils.

MRS. MARY W. MEAGLEY

One of Mrs. Meagley's assets as a teacher is her enjoyable personality. She is so vivacious and bubbling over with enthusiasm at all times that her spontaneity is contagious and therefore a great inspiration to her pupils. Besides this, she is a teacher of great pains and conscientious thought, together with splendid musicianship.

An Evening Recital

The following recital, given by Ethel Kimbell at the Toledo Museum of Art, was heard by the chronicler, and too much cannot be said for the careful preparation and relaxation of technic demonstrated by Miss Kimbell. That she is a young artist deserving of much credit and giving a great deal of promise for the future is almost an unnecessary statement.

She was assisted by Rhea Butler, a young soprano, possessing a charming lyric voice and a winning stage presence.

Both young artists are to be congratulated upon their success.

Program:

Fantasie in C minor ..... Mozart
Polonaise No. 1, in C sharp minor ..... Chopin
Theme and Five Variations (The Harmonious Blacksmith) ..... Handel
Caro Nome (Rigoletto) ..... Verdi
Concerto in G minor ..... Mendelssohn
Two movements (molto allegro con fuoco; andante)
Orchestral parts played by Mrs. Meagley on second piano
In Italy ..... Jean Boyd
April Tide ..... Ralph Cox
Etude in E flat major ..... Lacombe
A Song (Sea Pieces) ..... MacDowell
A merry song, a chorus brave,
And yet a sigh regret
For roses sweet, in woodland lanes
Ah, love can ne'er forget
Scotch Poem ..... MacDowell
Etude in C major ..... Cyril Scott
Rustle of Spring ..... Sinding

A Sunday Afternoon Recital

On Sunday afternoon of my visit a joint recital was given by two of Mrs. Meagley's advanced pupils. The numbers were, as printed:

Sonata Eroica, Op. 50 (Flos regum Arthurus) ..... MacDowell
Four Movements—
Slow with nobility—Fast, passionately
Elf-like
Tenderly, longingly
Fiercely
Miss Brand
Concerto, No. 2, in D minor ..... MacDowell
Three Movements—
Larghetto calmato
Presto giocoso
Largo; molto allegro
Miss Siek
Orchestral parts played by Mrs. Meagley on second piano
La Bandoline (Rondeau) ..... Couperin 1668-1733
Le Carillon de Cythere (The Chimes of Cythera) ..... Couperin
Danse Fantastique ..... David Stanley Smith (Born Toledo, O., 1877)
Polonaise Americaine ..... John Alden Carpenter (Born Park Ridge, Ill., 1876)
Miss Brand
Dance of Gnomes (Concert Etude) ..... Liszt
Nocturne, No. 5, in F sharp major ..... Chopin
Ecossaises (Three Short Scotch Dances) ..... Chopin
Ballade, No. 3, in A flat major ..... Chopin
Miss Siek
First Movement, Concerto in G minor ..... Saint-Saens
Miss Brand
Orchestral parts played by Mrs. Meagley on second piano

Both girls were distinctly talented and have already begun to do professional work in Toledo. Miss Brand has charge of all the piano students at the North Toledo Settlement, and Miss Siek is organist of the First Presbyterian Church. The writer is in possession of the program of a very interesting little recital given by pupils of Miss Brand at the North Toledo Settlement on June 18.

After this pleasant and refreshing recital the writer was entertained at a garden party given by Mrs. Meagley for her pupils and a number of the distinguished musicians of Toledo. This proved an informal affair of charming sociability.

The following program by Charlotte Wean was heard by this writer in rehearsal at the Art Museum on Sunday and bids fair to be one of the finest of the series:

Sonata, Op. 2, No. 1 ..... Beethoven
Four Movements—
Allegro; adagio; menuetto; prestissimo
Danse Andalouse ..... MacDowell
Shadow Dance ..... MacDowell
Alla Menuetto, Sonata in G minor ..... Grieg
Gigue ..... Godard
Prelude in C sharp minor ..... Rachmaninoff
Canzonetta ..... Schuett
Tarantella ..... Nollet

This was the last recital of a series of nine given during the month of June by pupils of Mrs. Meagley.

News of the work done in music at the Toledo Art Museum will appear in these columns later.

On May 22d the "Creation" was given by the Zion Mission Church Choir, under the direction of Albern Scholin, former correspondent of Music News.

May 26th and 27th the industrial classes of the Y. W. C. A. gave a pleasing rendition of the attractive cantata, "The Garden of Japan," by Herbert Wareing, in costume. It was under the direction of Mrs. E. D. Bevitt.

June 9th "Elijah" was given an excellent rendition by the Jamestown Choral Society, with orchestra, organ and piano, the entire production under the direction of Prof. Samuel Thorstenberg. The society will co-operate with the choir of the Chautauqua institution in giving "Judas Maccabaeus," "The New Earth," by Hadley, and "Elijah" during the Chautauqua season, the last two named with the New York Symphony Orchestra, which gives twelve concerts music week, July 28th to August 2d.

On July 12th Jamestown had the pleasure of hearing the Paulist Choir of New York, under the direction of Father Finn. The work of the choir justified the high repute in which the choir is held.

The Women's Relief Corps and James D. Brown Post on June 11 and 12 presented in concert the Betsey Lane Shepherd Concert Company, three artists, Betsey Lane Shepherd, soprano, having been heard to advantage at Chautauqua last season and having associated with her two of equal rank, Sara Gurowitsch, cellist, and Alma Grade, pianist.

On the afternoon of June 25th Miss Mary Lawrence presented her piano pupils in recital at the Mozart Club rooms. The numbers showed careful training, the closing number, "The Peer Gynt Suite" by Grieg, given with two pianos and assisting artists, F. L. Sack, violin, and Harold Crissey, cello, was especially pleasing.

Celoron Park, on Lake Chautauqua, is featuring good music. Prof. Samuel Thorstenberg is director-in-chief and personally conducted the Lyran Singing Society (male) and First Lutheran Church Band, which alternate with the Italian band, Joseph Triscari leader.

Miss Christine Fuerman, one of Jamestown's most popular piano teachers, has returned from a season in New York and has resumed her classes.

Miss Lillian Gustafson, who has been studying at the Damrosch School in New York, has returned to Jamestown for the summer.

Mrs. Richard Lindbeck, formerly contralto of the First Presbyterian Church, has returned from Evanston, Ill., where she resided while her husband, Lieutenant Lindbeck of the Medical Corps, was stationed at the Great Lakes Training Station. While in Evanston she studied with Grant Shaffer.

Among some twenty closing recitals by students of Yankton College Conservatory of Music (South Dakota), the following program by Mary C. Zollinger, pupil of Prof. L. N. Miss Zollinger is also a pianist of unusual ability, having presented a few weeks earlier the following recital:

Consolation No. 6 ..... Liszt
Mes Joies ..... Chopin-Liszt
Hark! Hark! the Lark ..... Schubert-Liszt

The Stadium Concerts

The summer season of music is on. The Stadium needed no opening, for it is an open place all the year around, and the music is furnished at reasonable prices. The official summer season was declared open on June 30. New York has not yet the proper place for summer music. You of the Middle West may take pride in Ravinia Park, but we New Yorkers cannot boast of such a picturesque place. There is money in plenty in the metropolis and the backers or the patrons of art do their duty, but so far we have not enjoyed a real comfortable summer resort. The Stadium is a huge field, very appropriate for baseball and picnics. The strains of the orchestra and the voices of human beings become mere sounds with but little effect. Not one patron of art has ever been thoughtful enough to propose the erection of a proper casino. Money is being expended generously, but the location has not been found yet. One prefers the playing of a band in the mall, but an orchestra with vocal soloists cannot give the real musical effects in a wild, unprotected field. The distance from the performers to the listeners is too great, and but little comfort is provided the music lovers; they sit on cold, hard stones with too little space, and if you wish any comfort at all you must carry your cushions to the Stadium. The admission is reasonable for any pocket, and the music, also the soloists, are satisfactory even to the critical listeners—but one could wish that in this year, when Americanism should be our first thought, an American conductor could be appointed for the Stadium.

Develop American Talent

We must develop our native talents. We must protect them by a comfortable livelihood. We must place the American talent where it belongs. We have just celebrated our Independence Day. Let us also celebrate the independence of our native talents. Let us free ourselves from foreign musical subjugation. Let our first dollar be paid the American and the second the foreign artist.

Ernest Davis' Plans and Engagements

Ernest Davis, the "tenor with return engagements," is reaping the fruits of a worthy appreciation. On July 10 he will be soloist at the Stadium. An important engagement is that as soloist for the October Maine Festival. He is to be one of the star singers at the festivals of Bangor and Portland. He is booked for ten appearances in various parts of the country—and he deserves them all.

Helene Romanoff in Automobile Accident

The excellent Russian soprano met with a serious automobile accident, caused by a collision on June 25. At the hour of this writing she is at the French Hospital. Following inquiry we were told that she is improving. We wish her a speedy restoration.

Giorgio Polacco-Edith Mason, Congratulations

On Sunday, June 29, Edith Mason, soprano, and Giorgio Polacco, the famous conductor, were married at New Jersey. They immediately left for Colorado to join the bride's mother. Edith Mason entered the matrimonial portals for the third time; her last husband, whom she divorced in 1917, was an architect, a graduate of Yale. The conductor divorced his wife in the same year. We present our congratulations.

Salvatore Impallomeni Conducts Opera

Salvatore Impallomeni hails from a musical family well known in Italy. He is a famous bandmaster, also a capable operatic leader. Mr. Impallomeni is a writer on old instruments, and Music News will benefit by his expert data of antique and modern instruments. In a future issue we shall give our readers an opportunity to read some of his interesting items about instruments. Salvatore Impallomeni conducted the operas for the performances of the "Federazione Lirica Italiana." He achieved striking successes in such operas as "Aida" and "Traviata." Notable artists sang under his baton.

Hudson Maxim and Louis Simmions to Launch a Chautauqua at Lake Hopatcong

I chose to desert New York last week for a cool spot in New Jersey. Lake Hopatcong was the choice, and a happy one. Through Mr. Louis Simmions, the eminent vocal teacher of New York, who is a resident of this lovely spot, I had the privilege of being introduced to Hudson Maxim, America's great inventor. Not all readers know that the author and inventor of the Maxim Silencer is also the writer of a very important book on music and poetry—"The Science of Poetry and the Philosophy of Language," printed by Funk & Wagnalls of New York.

I am in position to make a happy announcement. I have secured, exclusively for the Music News, a series of articles on music written by America's great inventor. At a luncheon given by Hudson Maxim he announced that shortly he will launch a chautauqua at Lake Hopatcong. He will have the collaboration of Mr. Louis Simmions, the well-known vocal teacher of New York. The writer will also be on the committee for the erection of a musical auditorium. We expect to give important summer concerts, perhaps, during the summer of 1920. Hudson Maxim is ready to donate land to the value of twenty thousand dollars. We will report the developments. Mr. Simmions devotes part of his time to teaching. Some of his New York pupils are here to continue their work.

THEATERS

"La La Lucille" at Henry Miller's

Wanted: A song writer to compose a decent tune, and, then, we want some singing voices, so sorely needed for the interpretation of our musical comedies. When it comes to a whirlwind dance the leading lady will not disappoint you. That's the case of Janet Velie. The music, by George Gershwin, has been heard in one hundred second-rate musical comedies. The comedy, or, rather, the farce, is amusing. In spite of many vulgar spots and cheap jokes, there is plenty of fun to keep you alive the whole evening. The complications also contribute to your amusement. The chorus girls are good to look at; the men, also, are neat-looking chaps. The costumes are of different colors, very tastefully contrasted. The scenery is simple but appropriate. Excellent acting by John E. Hazzard. The balance of the cast enlivens the show. In spite of the hot wave the audiences fill up this, one of the neatest and coziest theaters.

The book is by Fred Jackson and the show is produced by Alex A. Aarons and G. B. Seitz.

"Broken Blossoms" (a Film) at the Cohan Theater

D. W. Griffith comes back to life with one of the most appalling movie stories I ever chanced to see. In brief, Mr. Griffith shows us the great religion of Confucius, "Love Without Passion." A Chinese minister, sent to us to spread the Buddha teachings, revenges a man's brutality by shooting him after the latter whipped to death his foster daughter. The film is the most brutal, bloody, appalling example of photography. It unchains your nerves. It compels one to refuse to see another repetition of similar movie brutality. Even a brute would yield to pity, but the tender hearts will bleed during the expositions of a man's last degradation "to whip an innocent girl to death."

"You and I only are now the only exponents of our teacher's method, Maestro Vergine of Naples."

Lillian Gish, acting the victim, shows a masterpiece of horror. The story is so vividly interpreted that this Gish girl is the first movie actress who has succeeded in making one believe that acting, in the movies, does exist. And Mr. Griffith didn't forget the musical score, which was written by Robert Edgar Long and Louis Gotchalk. There are some oriental strains in their score. To me it is too sweet to be Chinese, but Confucius really had great dogmatic religion. The ballad, "Broken Blossoms," is characteristic Chinese, but its melody stops short of inspiration. The photography is artistic; it is typically "Griffithian."

The Wheeling newspapers commented as follows:

"Mme. Sibyl Sammis-MacDermid clearly demonstrated the possibilities of popularity when an artist combines good voice, charming manner, happy disposition and typical Amercan 'pep.' That is the only word that fully describes the MacDermid quality, which won her audience from the instant of her first number."—Register.

"Dramatic, pleasing, handsomely gowned and with a voice as delightful as any that has been heard in Wheeling for many seasons, Mme. Sammis-MacDermid scored heavily last night. Perhaps her special effort was due to the fact that her initial tour years ago with the Chicago Marine Band included Wheeling, but it is rather to be believed that this charming singer bends every talent and effort toward leaving friendly audiences in the wake of her tours. At any rate Mme. MacDermid, particularly in her Allied group, won Wheeling admirers by the hundreds."—Intelligencer.

THE SUCCESS OF A YOUNG AMERICAN VIOLINIST AND HIS AMERICAN TEACHER

Terry Ferrell, the young violinist, pupil of Ralph Brokaw of Wichita, Kan., who won the first prize on June 30 at Peterboro in the national contest conducted by the Federated Music Clubs of the United States, was undoubtedly finely prepared and well grounded. He comes from a teacher who has even before had fine success in teaching. This fact of preparation was proven June 16, when young Ferrell gave a concert under the Hypatia Club's auspices at Wichita before he went east to compete.

The program, to which was added seven encores and which is appended below, shows a diversified list. At the national contest he won by his playing of the Vieuxtemps Concerto (first movement), the Bach Chiaconne, unaccompanied, and Sarasate's "Gypsy Airs." Each number was selected per ruling from the national committee's list, but Mr. Brokaw, not satisfied, prepared him to play every number except one of the list.

His memorized repertory includes many other concertos besides, and three of the Bach sonatas for violin alone. Last year he presented in Wichita the Sixth Sonata. He has a strong tendency toward Bach, due to his admirable mentality and to the grounding taste and strict adhesion to the classics, no doubt, of his teacher.

Wichita has heard him previously in the Vieuxtemps, Mendelssohn, Spohr and Wieniawski concertos, as well as other large works, and in the recital of June 16 Wichita was prepared to hear artistic playing of an advanced standard.

Mr. Brokaw has been unusually fortunate in his material to work with, but it is well known that others have done fine work by his teaching, among the outstanding being two Interstate May Festival (Wichita) first prize winners and some who are now in lyceum and chautauqua work. He himself is a teacher purely American and studied exclusively with American teachers of high ideals and excellent traditional training.

The Brokaw Studios, with Mrs. Florence Young Brokaw, pianist, at the head of that department, have attracted no little notice in seasons past, not only in the West but they are also well known in Chicago musical circles.

Hypatia Club of Wichita sponsored young Ferrell financially on this trip east. Mrs. Brokaw accompanied him and has done all of his piano work in connection with his violin study. Harmony and history of music have not been left out in this young man's training. Mrs. Brokaw herself was a gold medal graduate in the composition class under Henry Schoenfeld at the Chicago Musical College several seasons ago, and likewise a gold medal pianist of the class of 1897.

The program appended shows a diversity in style, and it is hoped Ferrell will keep at work seriously along the high idealist line already laid out for him by his teacher. He is serious-minded, not wanting praise but desirous of playing well, and has already arranged for special repertory work of further caliber with Mr. Brokaw, who, by the way, seems to get a good, strong hold on his pupils' interest and develops intensity of purpose by a personal intensity in the welfare of his students. That he can recognize talent was evinced by the fact that three seasons ago he propounded to the editor of Music News the problem of what he should do to get a talent before the public and be situated in the West. That talent in his mind at that time was this young man who has captured the State (Kansas) Western District and now the national honors in the East in this federated club movement for young artists. And that question was propounded some three years ago! The three P's answered his query.

Mr. Ferrell's program follows:

Concerto No. 4, D minor ..... Vieuxtemps
Introduction and cadenza; adagio; finale
Indian Lament ..... Dvorak-Kreisler
Slavic Dance ..... Dvorak-Kreisler
Moment Musical ..... Schubert-Kreisler
The Bee ..... Schubert
One Fine Day (Madame Butterfly) ..... Puccini
Bon jour, Suzon (Good Day, Susan) ..... Pessard
Romeo and Juliet Waltz Song ..... Gounod
Mrs. Heckard
Preludium (for violin alone) ..... Bach
The Zephyr ..... Hubay
Scherzo Tarantelle ..... Wieniawski
Gypsy Airs ..... Sarasate

ELLEN KINSMAN MANN

Ellen Kinsman Mann is teaching a large summer class of pupils, some of whom are Chicagoans and others are from widely scattered parts of the United States.

An interesting feature of the teaching this summer is the class conducted by Mrs. Mann, which meets every Wednesday morning from 11:30 to 1 o'clock. There will be talks and general discussion on such topics as breath control, resonance, diction, poise, musicianship, and interpretation. Illustrations by artist pupils play an important part in the discussion, as well as the interpretation of song, opera and oratorio.

A number of recitals by artist pupils will be given during the summer term.

LOS ANGELES

Since my last letter the public has had a surfeit of excellent programs in the closing exercises of high school graduations, as well as schools of music and artist pupils' programs of the many excellent teachers of fame and ability who make their home here —the "Italy of America."

. . . . . .

The Zoellners String Quartet gave, this week, the fifth of their weekly series of ten chamber music programs. This one was, in the main, selections from modern composers who have made their fame as composers of music of this class by the Zoellners giving them introduction to America.

A quarter, "Novelletten," by Frank Bridge; two movements from a "Quartet in C," by Darius Milhand; "Quartet, Opus 3," by Jules Mouquet; "Two Sketches, Opus 15," "By the Tarn" and "Jack o' Lantern," by Eugene Goossens.

The above are all interesting creations, and students should hear them, but as to musical enjoyment they are startlingly cubistic or "ultra."

The program—Four—"Sonata Quartet," by Fasch (1688-1758); Handel's "G Minor," and Haydn's "Opus 76, No. 1," gave genuine music pleasure, melodically and harmonically, and in structural development.

Program Three, with Beethoven "Harp Quartet," Schumann's "Adagio Molto, Opus 41, No. 3," while the "Romantic Serenade, Opus 25," by J. Brandts-Buys, was a more modern creation.

Arthur F. Fuller gave another of his excellent concert programs. His piano numbes were "Zeus' Cortege," his own work; Beethoven's Adagio from "Pathetique, Opus 13," and "Ballade Romantique," by Manney. They were all played with pronounced technical regard; the Beethoven was finely interpreted.

His vocal numbers were seven of the very select—Handel's "Revenge, Timotheus Cries"; "Berceuse," from "Mignon," by Thomas; Cadman's "I Found Him on the Mesa"; H. J. Stewart's "California Night Songs"; "Stars of the Desert," by Finden, and "Lend Me Your Aid," from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," and several encores, Susanne Joyce Spear supplying fitting piano support. His articulation of tone and text was clear-cut, in good quality of tone, only lacking in physical support, as all were given in prostrate form on his couch, being paralyzed for a score of years.

The Orphean Trio—ladies of Hollywood —violinist, Silvia Harding; cellist, Dorothy Kirkland; pianist, Mabel Reiterman and pianist, presented artistically four compositions of A. F. Fuller, very serviceable works, entitled "The Quest of the Heart," "Romance," Quasi Espagnol" and a "Zoellner Souvenir." His whistling of Millard's song, "Waiting," was much enjoyed and elicited an encore.

A group of prominent teacher musicians have organized a "Fuller Fund" to aid him in his endeavor to keep up his work with less exposure on the street selling publications of music, poems and literary compositions. A liberal response was given the movement. A social at the Hotel Burlington netted more than $100, under the Matinee Musical Club auspices. He is progressive in his teaching and "down to date" with new thought in methods of teaching.

The new organization — vocal — called Choral Art Club, G. Haydn Jones, director, presented the charming cantata of the "Swan and the Skylark," by Arthur Goring Thomas, on June 19 at the Gamut Club concert, Auditorium. Selected good voice material was chosen, about fifty voices. Starting late, there was much irregularity in rehearsals, due to earlier engagements. A fine list of glees and part songs were given, in which Bathe, Carrol, Fletcher, Purcell, Richard and Fanning were used. Their rendition gave unbounded pleasure. Mr. Jones proved his ability as a conductor and an inveterate worker. The chorus talent consisted of successful solo voices and church choir special work service singers. The soloists were Miss Ruth Hutchison, soprano, prize winner for the Pacific Coast to the Biennial Federation of Women's Clubs, and she left the next morning for the Peterboro (N. H.) session of the clubs; A. Herrold De Grone of Chicago (now Los Angeles), basso of opera fame—his group was from Hawley, Freeby, Higgins and Penn, in which he delighted his audience with a rich bass voice. In encore he sang "Song of France."

Miss Hutchison's selections were Handel's "Come, My Beloved"; French song, "Les Yeux," by Rabey; "Magdalen at St. Michael's Gate," by Lehman. She sang a "Robin Song" for an urgent encore call.

The soloists for the cantata were well selected. They are in no case simple tasks. Tenor and soprano are set at the top range. Great speed in tempos and much syncopy.

Mrs. Edith Sage MacDonald, soprano, was heard to good advantage, and in "The Skylark" was most effective.

Ernest Burley, tenor, in a sweet quality voice, was heard to advantage in his solos and obligatos. His articulation was distinct and qualitative.

Z. Earl Meeker, formerly of Riverside, and late from service in France, very distinctly proclaimed and sang the baritone role. The concert musically was a success. The shortage in numbers in chorus, in the small hall, was not ineffective. The excellence of the program merited a crowded house. Many other attractions were held on the same date. It is hoped the club can be sustained to present works of such classic worth. Mrs. Hennion Robinson was the efficient accompanist. Mrs. De Grosse was at the piano for Mr. Grosse's solos.

Dwight C. Rice, teacher of piano, with class of eleven, gave a program, including four-hand and eight-hand pieces, as well as solos presentation. He is a painstaking and thorough instructor, and was formely with the Occidental College.

Sonata evening, with Alexander Saslavsky, violinist, and May MacDonald Hope, pianist. The program included Grieg's "Sonata, Op. 2, No. 13, G Minor"; Brahm's "Sonata No. 3, Op. 108, D Minor"; Cesar Franck's "Sonata in A Major." The artistic attainment of each of the artists produced these classic works with good concepts of the inner meaning of the composers. Mr. Saslovsky has a fine presence, honest playing (always), good, fine poise, presence inspiring and assuring. There was harmony of action and feeling between the extraordinary accompanying of Mme. Hope, who has concluded two seasons in courses of three to four programs each season.

The musicians gave a general hearing, with keen appreciation of the master's touch.

The June Gamut Club banquet had some new forecasts. The rejoicing on the revival given the club by the concert donation by Mme. Schumann-Heink, which netted $2,900, which was a boon of blessing for the club, and it was handed over by Mr. Behymer, the president, to the Gamut fund.

Many new members have applied for membership, and a new spirit permeates the great family of Gamuters.

Constance Balfour, who has returned from a long season in the East, favored us as a guest with a group of songs, pleasing her many friends, responding with encores. Miss Grace Freeby at the piano.

The return of Albert Wallenstein, cellist, from South America was a great treat, and, with his former pianist, Miss Freeby, gave, with his virtuoso skill, two A-1 selections and an encore following.

northern neighbor, San Francisco, made a pleasing talk on music managing in general. Following two fun makers in story, monologue and song, ladies from Calgary, northwest Canada, gave the club a respite in vaudeville style in happy digression. Mme. Christine Langenhan, soprano, an eastern artist, filling engagements, being one of the guests, on solicitation gave several operatic selections, one from "La Giaconda" and a group by Dvorak—"Songs My Mother Taught Me," "Bohemian Gypsy Song," and "The Soon Forgotten" (Tschaikowsky. She has a wonderful voice, and gave several encores. The club would have preferred more in the English tongue. A fine talk by Professor Baumgardt on the war in general. Then all repaired to the Gamut Auditorium and observed an illustrated dance, conducted by Zilla Ernestine Withrow, in a "Ballet Classique," with the assistance of a half dozen helpers—lady dancers, very entertaining and attractive. Quite a few celebrities and "returns" from "over there" were presented and made brief talks, recitations, or story.

A new event of much interest is the organization of a Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, with a $100,000 birthday present to start with. To open work October 24, with our Chicago friend and musician, Henry Schoenfeld, as conductor or batonist. W. A. Clark Jr. backs it with his dollars. L. E. Behymer, manager. Business men and women are also back of it. A season of thirty concerts is planned. Talent is to be engaged to devote their time to the orchestra in daily rehearsing and playing. The L. A. Symphony will also keep up its course. The program outlined is the best, and all are sanguine of success.

The Orpheus Club gave their second concert of the season in a program of much interest. "Christ in Flanders," by Ward Stephens, opened the program. "Deep Water," by Hahn, with an incidental solo, was ably sung by Verner Campbell, who has a bass voice of wonderful possibilities. Samuel B. Glasse sang a group of "Four Indian Love Lyrics," by Filder, and two of his own compositions in a very sweet-toned voice. Will Garroway gave three piano solos from Moszkowski, Granados, and "Rhapsodie No. 12" by Liszt. He was well received by a packed house. Leoncavallos' "Friend Pierro" gave much enjoyment. "Song of the Bullet," by Garroway, dedicated to the Orpheus, met with favor as usual. The other attraction was the big male quartet, known as the Orpheus Four, who first sang "Bugle Song" (Foote), "The Tear" (Witt), "Blowing Bubbles," Remick Bantock's "Lady of the Lagoon," and "Sweet Genevieve," and Buck's "Home, Sweet Home." The Orpheus "Four" were so favorably received that they returned on call four or more times. Joseph Dupuy director and Will Garroway as accompanist.

Mme. Esther Pallister, an English prima donna and operatic artist, who lives here and is teaching, gave a very elaborate program under the heads of oratorio, operatic and classic, and miscellaneous. The selections were of the best. The pupils were Mrs. Minnie Wilson, contralto; Flora MacPherson, soprano; Mab Clarke, soprano, and Frederick Herrmann, baritone. Each had an appearance in the divisions enough for a recital, if made continuous. Mme. Pallister sang in duet with Mab Clarke, also in duet with Mr. Herrmann. Mrs. Leonora Pier, accompanist. Mr. Cadman played in the "Robin Woman," from "Shanewis," for Mab Clarke, soprano. The work of the advanced pupils shows good material and splendid teaching.

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

By ELIZABETH FORESMAN BAGG

(Copyright 1919 by Mary Elizabeth Bagg)

PART II

What is voice placing? Some teachers make it the Alpha and Omega of voice culture; some ignore it altogether and work solely from the standpoint of interpretation. It is, however, merely one of the steps which the pupil must take on her way to good singing.

A tone must be properly placed in order to be a good tone, but everything is not gained when the tone is placed. It may be correctly placed and still, from lack of breath control, possess the defects of harshness, brittleness, lack of warmth, color, freedom, etc. Again, we have voices which have been correctly placed by nature. To these people, however, the understanding of the proper method of singing is quite as important as to those who have faulty voice placement. For instance, the student with the natural voice, as we sometimes call it, may quite easily fall into the hands of a teacher whose inefficiency will play havoc with even a perfect voice, if that voice is not safeguarded by understanding on the part of the student.

There is also the case of the singer, and this class is a large one, with whom a good voice, attractive personality and artistic interpretation have taken the place of a reliable method of voice production. For years, she goes her successful way, covering faults of method by delightful artistry and personal charm, or by the remarkable voice given her by nature, until the constant wear and tear of professional work begins to ravage her voice. Then we hear the thin, worn tone, even in some cases the ugly break, for which no adequate protection has been sought in a safe and perfect method. In a little while there comes that saddest of all commentaries upon the singer: "She is beginning to show her age!" And she is, poor soul, perhaps well under fifty.

A case which came under my own observation was that of a successful concert singer, a woman with a brilliant voice, charming personality and great skill of interpretation, but a reckless singer as far as method was concerned. She came to me a few years ago and said: "Tell me what is the matter with me. I'm singing badly, and I dont know why." I heard her sing. As a matter of fact, she was singing exactly as she had been singing for fifteen years, but the sins of method, or lack of method, were beginning to triumph over the resistance of a naturally fine voice, no longer assisted by youth and perfect health. The high notes were going. Incidentally, this singer was also a teacher!

Voice placing, then, either natural or accomplished, is not everything. It is merely the placing of the voice in that location from which a perfect tone can be brought forth and maintained. It can be done, in fact it must be done, as simply and naturally as the breath is controlled and used. It is seldom done satisfactorily by means of technical descriptions of the throat and the vocal cords, as many teachers try to do it, for the reason that with the average pupil these descriptions not only bewilder but by concentrating her attention upon the throat make probable the very action that the teacher is trying to prevent. If the pupil were a throat specialist—if she were even an intelligent musician—the scientific explanation of the action of the vocal organs might bring forth the desired tone. The future prima donna, however, is seldom either of these. She is much more apt to be a willing, earnest but quite bewildered girl of seventeen or eighteen, with a voice that is so far beyond either her mental or physical development that great tact and patience are needed to put her safely and quickly into the right road.

Let us begin, then, by doing the work for her by means of simple exercises—we would call them five-finger exercises if they were for the piano—telling her a little at a time, and as simply as possible, what these exercises are doing for her. We will not confuse her at first with talk of vocal cords and registers (these will come later), but will tell her that as she sings her voice must be lifted out of the throat, into the masque of the face, thrown over and out at an imaginary point outside the face.

As the teacher of dramatic art tells her student to talk to "the last man in the balcony," so we tell our pupil to send the voice out, in an arch, over, to the imaginary point in front of her. At first she will not understand, but the exercise will soon help her. She will grow accustomed to the "yawny" feeling that accompanies a tone of this sort, and thinking, always, of the masque of the face and the point outside, employing the breath as she has now learned to do, from the diaphragm, to sustain the tone, she will forget that she has a throat, and forgetting will not be apt to clinch the tone there, as so many earnest beginners do.

The less you talk to the beginner about the throat, the better results you are likely to have. It reminds one of the story found in one of our childhood's books, of the anxious mother who so earnestly begged her children not to put beans in their noses. The children had never thought of this fascinating pastime, but they straightway found beans and set to work.

Now, for the exercises themselves. They are built on simple variations of the scale, using the vowel sounds—"a" as in "father" and "o" and "e." An English actress, noted for her lovely speaking voice, has said that the so-called dreadful American voice does not exist. That is, its dreadfulness is due not to anything in the voice itself, but to the mishandling of certain vowel sounds by the owner of the voice.

Of course, in a sense, we know that. At least, we know that there was nothing radically wrong about the American voice or we should probably not have had that splendid list, embracing the names of Homer, Farrar, Eames, Cary, Kellogg, etc., as well as the hundreds of fresh and beautiful voices which come to us every year from every part of the country. But perhaps all of us had not thought of the simple remedy which she suggests and which she is using to correct the nasal, thick and shrill voices which come to her studio for help.

Now, vocal teachers have been using vowel work for years to insure correct placing of the singing voice. To be sure, each pupil, like each patient, requires individual treatment. The vowel "o," which will lift one voice out of the throat into the proper channel, may with another prove too somber, so that the pupil will need the broad "a" or the clear "e." With another, perhaps, "e" by itself may encourage the attack of the glottis—a fatal error—and we may have to use instead "e" and "c," which gains the same effect and avoids the attack.

Although the entire scale of the voice must have the same form in tone—always in a straight line from the lowest to the highest note as it strikes the imaginary point outside the face—it will not all arrive at this point or perfect state at once. The tones must be built or added slowly and carefully, from the middle voice up and then down. Let the pupil begin her five-finger exercises at about B flat, that is neither high nor low, and work carefully on this middle voice until she understands her method, adding a note higher or one lower, gradually, until the perfect scale is formed, thus avoiding strain in upper or lower registers while still in the early stage. Never force a voice. Proper work in the middle voice cannot fail to make good upper and lower tones.

An excellent beginning exercise is the following. Use first "o," then the broad "a" and finally "c."

Use this exercise, beginning at B flat, going up a note each time; then, beginning again at B flat and going down. Then take this one with the same vowels:

Another excellent exercise, one which gives all the vowel sounds and is thus most useful as a preparation for songs, is the plain scale, using the words of the old hymn: "Softly now the light of day." Go up the scale on the words, then take the next phrase to come down with—"Fades upon my sight away." The words "Ave Maria," sung upon a single note, is a useful exercise, giving the pupil the opportunity to use the same tone with the different vowels.

If the pupil will put twenty minutes, two or three times a day, of thoughtful work on these exercises, prefacing them with breathing exercises, and never for an instant forgetting that breath and tone must absolutely work in partnership, the former feeding and sustaining the latter, she can hardly fail to find that her voice is being correctly placed and that it is building new tones and getting ready to go on toward further development.

There are, of course, many other scales and exercises which can be used by the pupil to gain velocity. These we have selected with a view principally to voice placing and building.

Though I have not often found it necessary to caution my pupils against over practice, I am constantly having to remind them that ten minutes of head work is infinitely more valuable than an hour of mere singing. One scale intelligently sung is more helpful than fifty merely vocalized. Another thing that one often has to tell students, and that one sometimes wishes one might tell teachers, is that you cannot build a voice on whispers. You must use your breath, use your voice, use your strength, otherwise they will never develop. You must put life and verve into your exercises just as the athlete puts them into his dumb-bell work, or your voice will not grow. This does not mean that you must shriek or force the voice—it means that you must sing, not merely whisper or hum. The mezzo voce voice is the voice with which the majority of our practicing should be done.

NEW COMPOSITIONS OF ALEXANDER MAC FADYEN

"The Mother," dedicated to Mme. Schumann-Heink, and "The Magic Rosary," two new songs by MacFadyen, are just off the press of Schirmer & Co. and bid fair to increase the popularity of this composer as an art song writer.

Six new piano pieces and the sonata played by Josef Hofmann with great success in his New York recital in January are now in course of publication. This sonata will find its place in the repertoire of every pianist looking for an American composition of true musical value and at the same time unusual popular appeal. When played by Adams-Buell, the prominent Milwaukee pianist, before the Wisconsin State Music Teachers' Association at Madison, it created more than mere favorable comment and was pronounced by many to be the best American composition to date.

Mr. MacFadyen is a serious and broad-minded musician and pulls the taste of the public up to better things in every composition he puts forth. There has been no pandering to the common artifices, and these newer offerings cling to the established order.

Lockport—A new trio for piano, violin and violoncello, by Adolph M. Foerster, will be performed for the first time at the American Musical Festival at Lockport, N. Y., by the Pittsburgh Artists' Trio, Mrs. Blanche Sanders Walker, pianist; Mrs. Ruth Bowers Gibson, violinist, and Miss Myrtle June McAteer, violoncellist.

PRACTICAL MUSIC QUESTIONS OF THE MOMENT

An Address Delivered Before the Minnesota Music Teachers' Association at Northfield by Charles E. Watt and Reproduced Here by Request of the Officers

PART II

The Americanization of Music

But—we may talk all we like—we may plan all we please and we may think that through democratization of music we are accomplishing wonders, but the truth remains that there is a deeper—a more significant factor which must also be considered, and if we do not consider it we shall arrive nowhere in our effort toward making music the thing it should be in this country.

In almost everything else we are an independent, outspoken nation, we believe in ourselves and we are not afraid to measure up against the world, but in music alone we have always been and, to a great extent, we are still a nation of snobs.

And our growth in music will never be a Nationalistic thing until we have learned to Americanize our music and to value our own resources and developments at their real worth.

It was natural—perhaps inevitable, that at first we should worship Foreign music, for we had to get all our ideas, our repertoire and our technical knowledge from abroad during those years that we as a Nation were in the formative stage.

And—very willingly we sent our talented sons and daughters over the water in order that they might sit at the feet of the mature educational factors over there, and more than gladly we welcomed all visitors from across seas who came to show us what had been developed in a musical line.

All this went on for years, and our own musical growth and perception became keen. Our own young Americans brought back from Foreign studies all the best of the Foreign Schools and experience—and, in addition, we absorbed here a great deal from those of the Foreign artists who came to visit us.

And this went on and on until, years ago it had become true that through interchange, absorption and development we had actually surpassed our former masters.

The Foreign teachers who had located in America and the Americans who had studied Abroad as well as those who had studied with the Foreigners and the returned Americans here finally developed so greatly that it came to be the fact that the best teachers in the World were to be found in the American cities—nay, scores of them went abroad and became the best known and the most sought-after of pedagogues in the European cities.

American voices began to have a great reputation in Europe—the opera houses over there were full of American singers.

And so matters stood at the beginning of the World War.

But, a curious anomaly existed. The American Public, taught for generations to regard European Musical Ideals and accomplishments as "the best"—refused to accept the Americans at their proper valuation and, while the good teachers were accepted in a way, there yet remained the inexorable feeling that for the "real finish" one must go abroad for the last years of study, and no singer, no matter how fine, could gain a place here—especially in our Opera Houses, through any other means than by going to Europe and first gaining recognition there.

We—as a Nation, had no confidence in ourselves, and even our musicians distrusted each other to the extent that pupils were always advised to "save your money" and buy tickets for the great European's concerts rather than told to pay it for a ticket to hear the efforts of fellow American artists.

There has been—continuously, much snobbishness as to American music in the Public-at-large, but, personally, I believe that there has been even more in the American musical profession and that the attitude of the Public has always been a reflection of the musicians themselves—for, the Public is, and always has been, quite willing to be led by the professionals, and had the latter but assumed the proper attitude the European monopoly could long ago have been broken up.

And—thank God! it has received a very stunning and almost a "knock-out" blow during the war.

Many things in our National life are different since the war, and music is no exception.

If we are but ready now to realize and to seize our advantage and to thoroughly work out our own salvation we have the opportunity in our very hands.

. . . . . .

To digress a moment—and to use a simile.

It was said—always, that no country but Germany could manufacture really good dyes, and therefore we—of America, with most of the rest of the World, bought most of our dyes from Germany previous to the war.

But—during the war we could not get them. What did we do?

Simply what we have always done in any emergency—we set about it to develop some of our "undeveloped resources," and soon we were making as good dyes as anybody. Probably we make them now much better than Germany ever did—or, at any rate, we soon will.

And now that the war is over will we go, immediately, back to Germany for dyes? Not at all. We will more likely, after perfecting our skill, sell them to the Whole World.

. . . . . .

And all this is a very clear index of what we might do in music did we but feel absolutely put to it.

. . . . . .

It has been hard enough in America for Teachers to get their full deserts, and much harder for American born and bred artists—singers, pianists, violinists and all the rest.

But—the trials of these classes—the ignominy heaped upon them by the public and (it must be reiterated) the ignominy they have heaped upon each other, has been as nothing to the fate of the American composer.

We have heard "The Classics" and especially those of the German school so much and so long that they have become as a fetish to us and American composers have had, until very recently—very small chance indeed to develop their resources.

But—we have had American poets whom we have gladly classed wtih the best of the Old World—we have had novelists who have been second to none. Our playwrights have long since surpassed the whole world of play writers—and these are but a few examples of the many ways in which we as Americans have equaled and by degrees surpassed the world.

Why, then, has it seemed impossible that we should do the same thing in music? Simply prejudice, nothing more.

Our "commercialism," our "newness," our "lack of atmosphere" have had nothing to do with it. We simply would not give our own composers half a chance.

But again, the war has done wonders. Even if some hide-bound musicians did contend for the privilege of sticking to "the established best," even if they did cry aloud against the "sacrifice" of "all that was best" in music—the Public, the dear, Patriotic Public, and that part of the musical profession that was proud to be named as a part of Patriotic America insisted that we must do away with German text songs during the war and that Modern Germans at least must be taboo.

And what was the result? Why, we simply discovered that we could do very well without any German music at all if we had to.

We substituted Scarlatti and Rameau for Bach, just as an experiment, and we discovered that Grieg was equal to filling many niches formerly occupied exclusively by German music—and, best of all, we actually discovered that the great MacDowell Sonatas are just as fine for purposes of advanced study in the class room as the Sonatas of Beethoven himself, and that, in public, these works make just as fine an impression.

And, not content with the rediscovery of MacDowell, we sought further, with the result that there were All-American programs heard all over the land, and many of us, including some portions of the dear public, have discovered that there are thousans of worth-while American compositions now on the market.

And why should we lose all this advantage now? We must not if we expect music in America to become a vital part of the New Republic now in the forming before our very eyes.

Music must cease being an exotic and must become a very real part of ourselves if it is to be a big factor of the future.

Many will say (including, always, those unfortunate musicians who cannot get away from tradition) that there is no reason why we should ever hear anything but "the best"—that it is belittling to accept that which is not so good as the best we have known.

And—while this thought is true in a certain way, and while it is the fact that we must continue to hear and to study the music of the Whole World, it is yet far more important that we get into our musical life real Americanism, and that, absolutely—can come only through the encouragement of our own musicians and, first of all, Our Composers.

We need not, nay—we must not, accept mediocrity. We must insist that our writers equal and surpass all that has gone before, but we must remember always that they can do this only through patronage and encouragement.

Therefore we must make "America First" our watchword, and we must give Americans the preference everywhere.

Teachers should use some American Compositions in every lesson—artists should continually present American Compositions.

We must study these carefully, and we must keep up a constant system of elimination whereby the bad or the merely passable are weeded out as fast as discovered— but, in our search for the really good we must be willing to listen to a great deal and to give actual trial to everything which seems worth while.

No lowering of standard do we preach—only an insistence that American Composers be given a chance to reach the highest standard in the world.

And this principle must be applied all along the line.

We must try out our American artists continually, and wherever good is found we must indorse and support it.

Wherever it is found that an American can do as well as a Foreigner we must use the American by preference.

We must cease to make ourselves the laughing stock of the Whole World by paying exorbitant prices to Foreigners, and we must fearlessly put our own rating upon them regardless of what we are told by the Foreign and the New York Managers.

When a really great artist is discovered—Foreign or American, we must tell our pupils to go and hear him—but we must cease advising that the European be heard at any cost and that the American be discounted even before heard.

We are bold enough and brave enough in other lines of life and endeavor—why not be a little more bold and independent in Music?

Why not, when any of our great Orchestras chance to need a new Conductor, look to Young America for a possibility? Why must we forever scan the Foreign horizon first? Why not even make so bold as to think it possible that an American might become Director of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York or of the Chicago Opera Association? Must we forever bow to Italy or France?

We have learned, thoroughly, that bowing to Germany was a quite useless and an even ludicrous exhibition. Will we be wise enough to apply the lesson further?

Yes—beyond question we will, and it is only to be hoped that we will do this NOW—for, now is the accepted time—THIS is the year in which we can begin to put into our music that Americanism which will make it endure and grow.

Did Italy or France or Germany become great musical nations through imitation of any other or through constant importation of another's ideas and ideals?

No. They became great through Self-Development—and America will be really great in Music only when she insists that her music be thoroughly Americanized.

We need to use all our own best musical blood—we need to develop everything we have.

We must always listen to the music of every nation, and we must never be afraid to compare and measure our own with any rule extant—or with anything of the past, but we must get OURSELVES into our own music and must know that Democracy and Americanism walk hand in hand in musical matters even as in most other good things of this world.

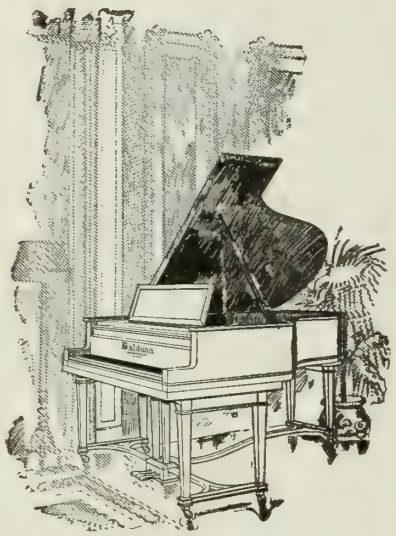
Refinement of Tone and Delicacy of Touch

Are the Distinguishing Features of the

Baldwin Piano



IT is these features that lend confidence to an artist when playing a recital. Nothing is so inspiring to even the amateur as the sympathetic tone and the wonderfully responsive action of the Baldwin.

Vol. 11 Chicago, July 18, 1919 No. 29

The N. F. M. C. in Its Peterborough Meeting Tacitly Endorses the Position Long Held by Music News in Reference to Contests and Awards the Winners Cash Prizes

THE Biennial of the N. F. M. C., held recently at Peterborough, was not only an important and dignified Convention of sincere thinkers and workers in the music cause of America, but it became, through environment, a specially grateful reminder of the life of the late Edward MacDowell and brought a welcome emphasis upon his fine works.

And the meeting did much more than this also, for it was the scene of a contest between young American musicians which had a specific and a thoroughly worth while significance. The winners of the piano, voice and violin contests were each given a cash prize of $150.00 and announcement was made that these prizes will be given in the same way each year.

So important is this development that we here record the names of the prizes and their donors in perpetuity, for, unquestionably, these will have a wide influence on the future music life of the country.

* * * * * *

These prizes are: The James H. Rogers Prize (Voice), donated by Mrs. Frank A. Sieberling; the Edward MacDowell Memorial Prize (Piano), donated by Mrs. A. J. Ochsner, and the William G. Whitney Prize (Violin), donated by Christine Miller-Clemson.

The winners of these for the current year are scheduled in another column of this issue of Music News.

* * * * * *

And not only were these prizes awarded, but also, in several cases, various Clubs of the Federation paid the traveling expenses of contestants, and there was taken up at Peterborough and discussed freely the subject of planning this sort of aid in the future.

And, best of all the practical results, Mr. A. A. Van De Mark, the Manager of the National American Musical Festival to be held at Lockport, N. Y., in September, came to Peterborough at this time for the specific purpose of hearing the young American artists and, after the prizes were awarded, offered each of the winners an engagement at Lockport in September with a fee of fifty dollars, the offer to fall to the second choice of the Judges of the Contest in cases where the first prize winner could not accept because of the distance of Lockport from his home.

* * * * * *

Music News rejoices in all this because it is a practical endorsement of the "Commercialism" preached by its Editor for the past five years and because it shows that the work of the N. F. M. C. has finally reached a point of practicality where it can be unreservedly endorsed.

* * * * * *

When the contests of young American artists were first inaugurated by the N. F. M. C., Music News pointed out the fatal defect in the plan, which was that the whole idea was too idealistic and altruistic and not in the least practical from the money standpoint.

We pointed out that it was wrong to ask young artists to compete in cities far distant from their homes (Los Angeles was the locale that year), when nothing more practical was offered the prize winners than the probability of engagements made through committee members of various Clubs who might be in attendance at the Convention.

In fact, so positive were we that this was not a worth while contest that we offered a challenge whereby we agreed to give extensive free advertising to every one of the young prize winners who could prove to us that he made any concert engagements (at fair fee) through his appearance in the prize contests.

It is almost needless to repeat that we had to pay the forfeit in but one case.

* * * * * *

At that time many officers of the N. F. M. C. assumed that Music News was antagonistic to the Federation itself and we were reviled very freely. The monthly music magazine which is the mouthpiece of the Federation called attention editorially to the fact that while "the Whole World" (otherwise) was applauding the generosity and the skill of the N. F. M. C., Music News alone stood outside as a scoffer.

* * * * * *

We want to repeat what we said then. We had not then, nor ever have had, any feeling of antagonism to any plans of the N. F. M. C. On the contrary we endorse and applaud almost everything they do.

* * * * * *

But, we do believe that the one thing that is lacking in the music life of America today is sufficient Commercialism, and we insist that every factor which would really help the young artist must do so through his pocketbook.

We do not believe that money should be given him for nothing, but we do believe that every contest should have a MONEY PRIZE at the end of it, and that every engagement offered should have a fair fee attached.

* * * * * *

Evidently, now, the N. F. M. C. believes the same thing, and therefore Music News and the N. F. M. C. are absolutely at one in the matter.

* * * * * *

Therefore, let's all be happy!

* * * * * *

But, before dropping the subject, there is one other item for consideration. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra is just now also proposing a young artists' contest and is offering, generously, that the prize winners shall be allowed to appear as soloists in the Popular Concerts given by the Orchestra the coming season.

No one can do aught else than applaud the impulse which makes this plan possible. But, the same question of monetary valuations comes into this.

Are the prize winning young artists to be paid for their appearances with the Orchestra or are they supposed to gain "honor and prestige" from the appearance in such quantities as to be a full compensation for the effort?

If the latter is the case, Music News is positively opposed to the plan.

* * * * * *

Elman, Levitzki and Heifetz appeared with our Orchestra as mere youngsters, but they were paid very liberally even for the first appearances. If there are any young violinists and pianists in Chicago good enough to win place on the Orchestra programs they are, also, and very emphatically, good enough to be paid for their work.

* * * * * *

The supposed idea that the Critics of Chicago will hear them in their Orchestral appearances and applaud their excellencies is too far fetched to be feasible. The Critics, like all other people, measure things commercially. The Critics are influenced by the fact that Heifetz is a great money maker just as much as by the fact that he is a fine artist.

* * * * * *

It would be absolutely unfair, from every standpoint, to put young American artists on the Orchestra programs unless it were a positively known fact that they were considered good enough to be well paid for their work.

* * * * * *

If they are well paid they at once attain the prominence of artist. If they play merely as prize winners they remain, irrevocably, in the amateur class.

OSCAR SAENGER

Oscar Saenger is the pioneer of guest teachers in this country. And this is how it happened. Just before the war broke out, Mr. Hanson, a New York manager, offered Mr. Saenger a teaching tour across the country. By this plan he was to stay in one city just two or three weeks. However, because of war conditions, this plan could not be carried out, and so arrangements were made at Mr. Kinsey's suggestion for a five weeks' summer teaching term at the Chicago Musical College. This was three years ago, and the plan was so successful beyond all expectation, that other teachers have been engaged each successive summer.

This year Mr. Saenger's time is completely filled. Last week he gave one hundred half-hour lessons and two hours of repertoire, as may be seen from the schedule printed below.

His classes are made up of young singers from twenty different states, from New York to California, and there is much good material included. A number of them, Mr. Saenger claims, will make a name for themselves later on. In the midst of his very busy schedule Mr. Saenger says he has time to find great enjoyment in his stay in Chicago, and likes the city very much.

The idea of bringing the teacher to the pupil, instead of the pupil to the teacher, is an entirely new and original idea in our modern, progressive life, but besides being a pioneer in this direction, Mr. Saenger has been in the vanguard of many other new movements. For instance, it was in large measure through his influence that the doors of the Metropolitan Opera were opened to American singers, who now comprise about fifty per cent of its roster.

A Wonderful Schedule

AT ORCHESTRA HALL

The music at Orchestra Hall this Summer is of unusual excellence; for, besides the fine programs and good playing offered by the orchestra under the artistic baton of Rudolph Mangold, the organ manipulation of Mildred Fitz Patrick is at once artistic and inspiring.

Few indeed are the organists who could so synchronize the organ with whatever scene may be passing on the screen, and still fewer are those who could hold to such a splendid status of technical accuracy and real musical interpretation at the same time.

Miss Fitz Patrick plays everything, and she knows how to range from grave to gay and from brightness to gloom with such skill and effect that one often, at Orchestra Hall, forgets to pay attention to the picture and instead listens with rapt attention to Miss Fitz Patrick.

During the past week the "big picture" was "The Firing Line," with Irene Castle in the part of Stella Cardross, and there was besides one of the clever "Bobby" pictures, very funny indeed; something educational about the Weather Bureau, and the usual fascinating travel pictures.

The special soloists of the week were Mignonne Meeker, soprano, and Dorothy Henke, contralto, who in some pretty duets made a nice picture and showed good voices, although one or the other of the two persistently sang off key the night their work was heard by this writer. C. E. W.

Music in Chicago

A CONCERT IS GIVEN FOR THE ASSOCIATION OF PRESIDENTS AND PAST PRESIDENTS

The Association of Presidents and Past Presidents of the State Music Teachers' Associations, assembled in Chicago the past week, was entertained on last Tuesday evening by a program of songs and piano music given by Fredericka Gerhardt Downing, contralto, and Margaret Farr.

Mrs. Downing, in superb voice and, as always, at the top notch of artistry and effectiveness, sang "Farewell, Ye Hills," from Tschaikowsky's "Joan of Arc," in a way which could be approached by but few singers and was thoroughly ingratiating also in "Invocation to Eros" (Kursteiner), which she sang with much musical feeling; "Coddle Doon," a charmingly direct and expressive song by Homer, which fits Mrs. Downing like a glove, and the "Spring Song" of the Robin Woman in "Shanewis" (Cadman), a piece of such power and meaning that, if it were better known and more used, would speedily become one of our standard concert numbers.

Miss Farr, a brilliant pupil of Walter Spry, played numbers by Bach, Chopin, Tschaikowsky and Liszt with a lot of style, much nicety of technical adjustment to passing needs and a continual display of musical virtues.

The well-known Dohnanyi Rhapsodie was very brilliant in her reading, the Sibelius Romance very musical, and the Carpenter "Polonaise Americaine" distinctly fine.

The concert was held in the recital hall of the Columbia School of Music and was thoroughly enjoyed by the delegates present. C. E. W.

A good percentage of these are now doing professional work, including Helen Grahame Wait, Sybil Comer, Merlyn Pococke, Doris Doe, Susanne Brown, Marie Sweet, Juanita Wicker, Emily Lee Phelps, Fanny May Baldridge, Josephine Decker, Grace Holversheid, Irene Harruff, Opal Craven, etc. Mrs. MacDermid's studio will be in the front of the building, overlooking the lake, in a suite with James G. MacDermid.

Marie Yung.

The occasion was an entertainment given by the Drama League, and the dances and accompaniments were naturally an artistic delight.

Mrs. Fonger played also at Great Lakes on the evening of July 15, again accompanying the pupils of Mme. Yung.

THE WESTERN CONSERVATORY PRESENTS A TALENTED YOUNG PUPIL IN RECITAL

Last Wednesday, for the second time, the Western Conservatory presented Lucile Epstein in piano recital in the attractive rooms in the Kimball Hall Building, and for the second time she pleased the audience immensely and proved her great talent and her decided advancement in the art of piano playing, although she is now but nine years old.

During the course of the year just passed she has added much to her technical equipment, and her musical feeling has also grown decidedly more mature.

If she continues year by year to show this growth and this improvement it is easy to predict for her a very unusual career; for, very evidently, she is a faithful little worker, and just as certain is it that her teacher, Grace Knowlton Scott, is conscientious and artistic, for everything done by the young pupil reflects sincerity and thoroughness as well as musical feeling and poetic thought.

Lucile does not yet attempt to play much of the classic school or anything at all of the great bravura works with which little children are sometimes encouraged by their teachers to struggle, and in this Mrs. Scott is exceedingly wise.

For, while it is distressing to see a small pupil fall far short of accomplishing anything like an adequate performance of the greater works for the piano, it is always a special delight to hear one of them play a program of works which is specifically appropriate in youthfulness of thought and feeling and in the required technic for presentation.

And such a program was that played on Wednesday evening by Lucile Epstein.

The Waltz by Godard was clear in rhythm, definite in tonal values and well shaded, the Etude (Wollenhaupt), a graceful piece, and the distinctly rhythmic Minuet of Paderewski were both well thought out and well presented, and the sparkling "Bubbling Spring" of Rive-King was made to purl and glisten in most attractive style.

LUCILE EPSTEIN

The Chaminade "Arabesque" was bravely attacked and quite successfully negotiated, the accents being strong and logical and the musical aspects of the difficult piece being well conserved. The Heller Tarantelle again proved to be an attractive thing when well done and the program ended with a two-piano piece by Durand, in which Miss Epstein was assisted by her teacher.

Three young singers from the class of Margaret Dahlstrom reflected much credit on her, both in vocal excellence and in the unusual clarity of their enunciation.

These were Bessie Rocklin, Mary Kelly and Eliza Burling and their numbers were "An Open Secret" (Woodman), "If I Were a Rose" (Hesselberg), "The Star" (Rogers) and "Il Bacio" (Arditi). The Hesselberg number was particularly well sung.

There were also two students from the studio of C. B. Durkee, the efficient violin teacher of the conservatory, Lucy Klein playing "In Castle Halls" (Kearns) and John Geiger a study by Lester, both doing much credit to their teacher.

CHARLES E. LUTTON IN SONG RECITAL

Few indeed are the young singers who can select so varied and so unique a program as can Charles E. Lutton, and still fewer are they who can present such a one with anything like his authority and style.

Mr. Lutton is the most wonderful Irishman you ever heard—when he is singing Irish songs; he is equally Scotch when the songs of the "canny nation" engage his attention, and he is typically and emphatically fine in negro songs, either of the comic or the "spiritual" character.

And, in addition to all this, he has the most marvelous pronunciation of Cockney English and of the various dialects of the kingdom that this writer has ever been privileged to hear and, withal, his enunciation of pure English is as near perfect as any singer may hope to attain.

His sense of humor is remarkable, and while every shade of drollery and of naivete is at his command, there is not even a hint of clowning in anything he does.

On the contrary, while you laugh with the Yorkshire man and Mr. Lutton, you never, in his recitals, laugh at them, and while the unction and the unconscious humor of the negro songs are always very evident, there is never a moment in the Lutton singing when these appear anything but natural and absolutely sincere.

These assets, I take it, are very rare, and on Monday night, at Music Hall in Evanston, they were found to be very admirable and very entertaining by a capacity audience, which applauded every song to the echo and redemanded a great many of them.

The whole program was so fine and so exalted in interpretative values that it is difficult to single out "best" numbers, but, in passing, it may be said that the audience liked "The Ballynure Ballad" so well that repetition was absolutely imperative, and they simply shouted with delight over the "Magpies' Nest."

"The Soliloquy" was, in my opinion, the drollest and the most elaborate of the old songs of the program, but just a shade too intricate for rapid assimilation.

The Spirituals, arranged by Grant-Schaefer, were admirable, both in conception and in the presentation given. The audience was pleased with the Morgan piece (he was the accompanist of the evening also), and the "'Ere in the 'Orspital" proved to be one of the most characteristic things yet done by Mr. Lutton, and the Nyvall piece was another "inspiration."

Altogether, a remarkable program, presented in a remarkably artistic and effective way.

ARTIST RECITAL AT BUSH

The Bush Conservatory, removed from the heart of Chicago, is none the less a very integral part of her musical constituency. Mr. John J. Blackmore, recently acquired by the piano department of the school, together with the well-known basso, Gustaf Holmquist, gave a joint recital on Saturday afternoon last. The spacious drawing rooms of the school were well crowded with guests.

The two gentlemen gave of their best, which is very good—exquisite, in fact. I have seldom noted a happier selection of numbers, each of which followed the last in pleasing contrast, as the program printed below will suggest.

Mr. Holmquist's attention to a song as a unit made a profound impression and carried the audience with him into the very mood and theme of each number. As his Chicago friends already know, he disdains to employ fortissimo singing except when the song actually calls for it. Quiet, delicately sustained notes may be just as musical and resonant as the "full steam ahead" variety, yet how few recognize that truth! The second two Handel numbers were done in a most delicate manner, as were the songs from the Scandinavian in the second group, and the last group was most appealing in an emotional way.

Mr. Blackmore won from the first with his interesting reading of the Paradisi Tocatta, and sustained interest through each of his well-conceived selections. He is a pianist of the more modern school of taste and execution, and it was a pleasure to hear his crisp, rythmical rendition of such things as the Leschetizky Etude, "La Picolla," and Grainger's "Irish Tune." Mr. Blackmore's own compositions were much enjoyed, and rightly so, for, while modern, neither of them is "wild" and both have the unity that the short composition should have. The first was the more pleasing, the second the more original. The excellent composition of Cyril Scott brought out this pianist's best and finest, as far as effectiveness went. Feathery touch, as well as strength; subjective feeling, as well as descriptive power, all these virtues were manifest to a great degree.

LeCaquet .....Dandrien-Godowsky

OPERETTA "CINDERELLA IN FLOWERLAND"

A rare treat was enjoyed by the large audience which filled the hall at "St. Mary's of the Lake" when the children of the lower and intermediate grades of that school presented the operetta "Cinderella in Flowerland."

For over an hour we lived in flowerland and really heard the flower children talk, laugh and sing. Their little whims, their jealousies, their jolly good times, their disappointments and their victories were all portrayed most vividly by these little ones. The bonnie bees were right on hand to assist fairy godmother Nature in seeing that the little meadow daisy attended the prince's ball. Prince Sunbeam was a picture indeed. The robins were most realistic as his heralds. The butterflies as they came forth with the little chariot containing Daisy in her transformation ready for the ball fairly made the audience gasp with astonishment. The proud, jealous sisters, Hollyhock and Tiger Lily, were as clever as they were naughty.

ETHEL CASEY

The sunbeams, raindrops, fairies and brownies all added to the picture. The hunt for the princess and the final discovery of the meadow daisy as she was wonderfully carried out. It was altogether the most perfect performance of a children's operetta that I have ever had the pleasure to attend.

Incidental dances were given in a very professional manner by Edith Mae Farrington, who is very gifted and expects to specialize after the completion of her general education.

Numerous other musical numbers by the children were interspersed through the evening, and between the acts of the operetta the Misses Laura and Edna Gansel, piano and violin artists, greatly pleased the audience with their music.

Lyravine Votaw was musical director for the operetta and Miss Ethel Casey was dramatic director. Miss Casey is a young woman of ingenuity and force, who has prepared herself thoroughly for this kind of work, but in addition has that keen sense of fitness and beauty that one's intuition prompts, which really is necessary to success.

The music was sung delightfully by the children, as it is music suited to their voices and they gave it with the spontaneity which Miss Votaw knows so well how to inspire.

The following evening Miss Casey also presented the grammar grades, especially the eighth grade, in their final exercises. The girls put real meaning into "Every Girl" and the boys gave a burlesque, "The Bogus School Inspector," with the life and realism that eighth grade boys possess.

The two evenings were enjoyable and reflected much credit upon the work done in this school.

Mr. Loomis played with great brilliancy and profound musical discrimination. His second group, containing his own charming Barcarolle, was the most interesting. The Debussy numbers were lovely in their impressionism and tonal color.

Miss Schalker possesses a full, resonant voice of pleasing quality and is to all appearances a great student of songs, for she was very adept at bringing out their various moods and characters.

Miss Esther Hirschberg played excellent accompaniments and Mr. Sopkin did well on the violin.

UNIVERSITY CONCERTS AT MANDEL HALL

The soloists at the university summer concert last week at Mandel Hall were Rollin Pease and Hugo Goodwin, a well-met pair in all particulars, who carried the capacity audience quite away with enthusiasm in spite of the intense heat.

Mr. Pease has a charming informal presence and a rich, rotund baritone voice, which he uses with good sense and artistic taste. His interpretative ability is unusual and distinctly individual. Outstanding among his numbers were "I Have a Rendezvous With Death" (Jeanne Boyd), which he infused with all its climactic possibilities, and "The Home Road," which he made lofty in its intent and meaning. "The Americans Come" was also much liked.

Mr. Goodwin was in singularly good form and it was a pity that his instrument was not. However, his disposition was equal to the occasion, for he made the best of it and gave us some decidedly interesting numbers impromptu, proving his great discretion and real artistry in so being able to choose and render what best befits the conditions at hand.

Both artists were enthusiastically encored and warmly received.

Later in the week Mr. Pease sang the same program at Northwestern University with an equal garner of success. Program:

"BROKEN BLOSSOMS" AT THE ILLINOIS THEATER

So thoroughly advertised has "Broken Blossoms" been that, had it any vital weaknesses, they must inevitably prove bitter disappointment to the throngs of people who buy seats day after day.

That these throngs are thrilled and pleased continually is proof positive that the said weaknesses do not exist, but on the contrary that there is—there must be—a wealth of truth and vitality in the photo play.

These are not found, however, in the prelude, which, in the opinion of this writer, is poorly done, and instead of whetting the appetite for the play to follow, it rather detracts from it.

The music, however, is a different matter, and throughout the entire performance it surges and plays about the pictures, and soothes or inflames the senses of the hearers in exactly fit proportions.

One hearing is not enough to insure satisfactory analysis, but not only is the music technically adequate, but also its choice and application is most skillful, and no film in memory has had a more wonderful or as effective a musical envelop.

The play itself deals with a subject so strange and which is so foreign to anything ever dreamed of by American audiences, that it startles continually.

But, while it startles, it also, inevitably and persistently grips the imagination and the emotions, and in its total effect it is very wonderful indeed.

The intensity of sadness which has been so freely advertised as its chief asset does not seem to me to fully materialze in the actual seeing of the play, for the part of the prize fighter who whips his daughter to death is too violently overdrawn to be readily appealing.

In fact, the only moments when the entire film affords any amusement whatever are those moments when this brute is shown at close range and we are asked to accept the facial contortions in which he indulges as real and true to life.

We can imagine, easily, a man brutal enough to strike a defenseless girl when he is inflamed by liquor, as was this beast in every case, but we cannot possibly believe that he would work up to this by a series of grimaces and glarings which, while they are intended by the actor to be horrific, seem on the screen merely ludicrous.

The prize fighter therefore was, to me, a distinct disappointment, and his very unreality, and even his improbability, robbed me of the real grief which might have been experienced had his daughter died a more natural and less bombastically prepared death.

The minor characters of the play are all done admirably in the Griffith production, as a matter of course, and the lighting effects and the style of presentation in general are all that anyone could ask and much more than anyone else than Griffith could provide.

But, after eliminating the impossible father, the whole interest centers about The Girl and The Yellow Man, and these two characters are really wonderful, both in conception and in delineation, and the thrill given by each of them and the emotions aroused by their sad fate is very genuine.

The Yellow Man comes to London, an ascetic worshiper of Confucius, and thinks to convert that city to his gentle and beautiful beliefs.

He is soon disillusioned as to the possibility, but, though he becomes a London shopkeeper, he retains his purity, his calm and his high ideals.

When The Girl is cruelly beaten by her father, she crawls away to The Yellow Man, and his love and compassion for her are manifested in the most touching way.

The father, however, learns her whereabouts and, coming unexpectedly, wrecks the place and drags The Girl home, there to beat her to death.

The Yellow Man follows, kills the brute, brings back The Girl to his home, covers her with flowers, pays his respects to Confucius and commits suicide just as the officers force an entrance.

Which is, of course, all very tragic and (in the case of the father) positively melodramatic, but nevertheless the whole incident is shot through and through with a beauty of character and a nobility of impulse and feeling which must be seen to be appreciated.

The actors who play The Yellow Man and The Girl are certainly subjects for sincere admiration and applause.

Music at RAVINIA PARK

REVIEWED BY CHARLES E. WATT

Children's Program

Story telling by Miss Grace Hemingway was the feature of the Children's Program on Thursday afternoon at Ravinia. Beginning with the story of the "Pony Engine," she told tale after tale, until the youngsters fairly sat on the edges of the seats. Surely there never was a better story than the one about the elephant's child—how he did so want to know what the crocodiles have for their breakfast, and how he traveled far and found out, and what amazing things happened after that—and Miss Hemingway's version of this inimitable part of the Jungle Book is delightful indeed.

GRACE HEMINGWAY

Every mother present must have coveted for herself this art of story telling, although few could hope to acquire so extensive a repertoire as this "Queen of Storyland." Stories enough to fill over a dozen different story-hours are at her tongue's end, it is said. Miss Hemingway is a graduate of Columbia University, New York City, and one of the best known authorities in the country upon Children's Literature and the Art of Story Telling. She has made a first-hand, intensive study of the folklore of Europe and the Orient. It was from her recent trip to Japan and China that she drew her rich store of stories for her second group on Thursday. These were told in the gorgeous costume of a Chinese Imperial Court Lady.

Miss Hemingway's stories were supplemented by singing on the part of the children in the audience. Under the leadership of Miss Annis Jewitt of Highland Park School, they sang the better known American songs, the words for which were printed on the back of the program sheets.

After an intermission of a half hour, the Chicago Orchestra, under Richard Hageman, gave a short program, which was thoroughly enjoyed by the children. During the last number I saw two four-year-olds out in the aisles, dancing rhythmically enough, and quite unconscious that they were being observed. The numbers selected by Mr. Hageman were as follows:

Dance Poem Psyche.....Paul Juon
Will o' the Wisp
Polka and Waltz
Intermezzo
Finale and Waltz
Madrigale .....Simonetti
Minuet of the Flies.....Czibullca
Waltz—Blue Danube .....Strauss

LOUISE MORRIS.

"Cavalleria Rusticana"

On Thursday night the bill was diversified in an interesting way from the conventional combination of "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci." Mascagni's short masterpiece occupied the opening half of the program, while after the intermission a varied program of orchestral and chamber music was supplied. Beginning back end foremost, Mr. Hageman opened the second half with the Cesar Franck Piano Quintet, assisted by a quartet from the orchestra. Not having heard Mr. Hageman for a year, the chronicler received an added thrill to that of last season, aided by an extraordinary keenness of expectation. And the anticipation was most heartily gratified, for his is, as always, the quintessence of musicianship, technicque and artistic feeling. As an accompanist we believe that few excel him, and as a conductor he stands in the first rank among his kind. On Thursday night his interpretation of Cesar Franck was incomparably sane and scholarly.

For the balance of the program the Ball Scene of Helmesberger was played and encored, harp solos were played, and the Sibelius "Finlandia" was given in conclusion.

The opera was given in its entirety with the following cast: Santuzza, Alice Gentle; Turridu, Morgan Kingston; Sola, Frances Ingram; Alfio, Thomas Chalmers; Mamma Lucia, Philine Talco, with Papi conducting.

Alice Gentle brought to the part all the benefits of her broad and varied experience and made of it a dramatic character and a charming vocal score. Her histrionic ability is great and her voice of well-famed beauty.

As Turridu, Morgan Kingston outdid himself on Thursday night in vocal excellence and dramatic fervor. He makes of the part a real power and proves himself a master in characterization. The Siciliano promised well for his vocal excellence, which was marked throughout the opera. This writer has never heard Mr. Kingston in better voice.

Thomas Chalmers as Alfio was also a distinguished asset, and Philine Falco in the mother's part was satisfactory.

"L'Oracolo"

Within twenty-four hours the writer witnessed two Chinese character studies of the greatest possible vitality and interest, but dissimilar to the final degree.

The first of these was the beautiful young Chinese student in the wonderful film,

GENNARO PAPI
Conductor

"Broken Blossoms," and the second the sinister, revolting Chim-Fang in "L'Oracolo," as delineated at Ravinia Park.

The "Broken Blossoms" Chinaman is simple and appealing—the one in "L'Oracolo" is complex and appalling in his every manifestation.

The "Broken Blossoms" boy is lovable and fascinating, and his death fills one with poignant regret, whereas the Scotti Chinaman is so utterly vile and contemptible that his death is welcomed by every attendant at the opera with a sigh of relief.

Scotti is, in all truth, a very wonderful actor, and in this despicable part he rises to points of artistic finish almost unbelievable in grand opera, and especially in a summer night performance on the Ravinia stage.

His singing voice is good, still—or at least it seems so in the Leoni opera—his dressing is wonderfully potent, and his facial expression and action all that could be asked of any opera singer and much more than the great majority of them could negotiate.

But, great as is the Scotti excellence, it is surpassed momentarily by the remarkable singing of Leon Rothier in the last scene as Win-Shee.

This part does not compare with that assumed by Scotti in picturesqueness or dramatic possibilities, but the vocal score attaching to it is a really remarkable one, and it is managed by Rothier in an altogether admirable way.

Louis D'Angelo, in another old man part, was also fine, his rich voice ringing out with freedom and power, and his action being entirely adequate to the part.

Orville Harrold sang the tenor part well, but looked it not at all, and Louis Derman, in a small part, again gave eloquent proof that he has great talent and possibilities.

Florence Easton, remarkable in everything she undertakes, negotiated the part of Ah-Yoe beautifully, looking it to perfection and singing with exquisite style.

Frances Ingram assumed the other woman part of the opera.

The stage setting and the management of the chorus was at a point of effectiveness never before seen at Ravinia, and the playing of the orchestra, under the skillful baton of Gennaro Papi, was a separate and a distinct joy.

"Pagliacci"

The Leoni opera was preceded by one act of "Pagliacci," and though not so elaborately or beautifully set as "L'Oracolo," it proved to be the best sung opera the writer has ever heard at Ravinia.

This was due, largely, to the wonderful art of Florence Easton, the splendid impersonation of Millo Picco, and the artistic and effective co-operation of Louis D'Angelo, who, as Silvio, sang the wonderful duet with Nedda (Miss Easton) in a way to bring out its every nuance and to accent its abounding beauty.

Miss Easton, beyond any question, is so far the best soprano at Ravinia this year as to leave almost no room for comparisons at all.

She has a remarkably full, rich and beautiful voice. It is musical and clear, and it is capable of the utmost of use, both as a vehicle for dramatic expression and as the instrument for pure coloratura display.

The last-named power was shown to such exceptional advantage in the "Bird Song" as to leave Miss Easton in the mind as the most satisfactory exponent of that number in memory, while her dramatic possibilities found vent again and again in the Leoncavello opera in a way to convince the most skeptical that she is in reality a tragedienne of untold powers.

Her facial expression is really wonderful, and her accentuation of all the moods and colors of the "Pagliacci" score was a treat and a delight.

She will be watched with ever-increasing interest throughout the Ravinia season, and she will retire, beyond question, with a full sheaf of honors.

Picco sang the Prologue in the same inspired and inspiriting fashion he made known to us last year, and throughout the opera was original, dramatic and finished.

Mr. Harrold accomplished some excellent singing and acted with some degree of inspiration.

Others in the cast were Chalmers, Rothier, D'Angelo and Easton, and as there will be repetitions of the opera, fuller comment will be made in a later issue.

MILLER'S EDUCATIONAL AND MUSIC GAMES

Mrs. Dorothy Miller of Kansas City has just introduced to Chicago a musical game, or rather a whole system of games, which are the result of years of study and a keen imagination which enabled her to visualize an idea in the various stages of its development to its now perfected state.

The principle of these musical games is splendid and far-reaching, and the paraphernalia is adapted to unlimited applications.

The games are played on a reversible table, on one side of which there is a large staff field in the center, with pockets on each degree for the placing of lettered marbles corresponding with the notes in the bass and treble clefs. On the four sides of the frame are keyboards with pockets on each degree corresponding with the notes on the staff.

Starting out with the simple experiment of knocking a marble out of the center field and placing it in its corresponding pocket in the keyboard, innumerable games are worked out by which a child can gain all the necessary knowledge concerning scale-building, intervals, chords, and harmonic modulation.

On the other side of the table there are expedients for learning note values and the essentials of rhythm in a similar way. There is also in connection with this table a game called the Movie Board, in which the more complicated essentials and applications of harmony may be learned and rehearsed without any suggestion of drudgery or monotony to the student. It is all transformed into a fascinating game, and the student is hardly conscious of the meaning of what he is learning until he begins to apply it, when he is much surprised to find the speed and accuracy with which he can put his acquired knowledge to use.

It is a game which is well worth installing both for home and school use and is equally adaptable to home games or for work in the classroom.

Mrs. Miller, who is now in Chicago for a brief stay, is a charming personality, an original thinker, and a teacher whose ideas deserve much attention and success.

THE STREATOR CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

That not all the good schools of music are situated in Chicago or New York is shown by the fine conservatory catalogs which are arriving from the smaller cities.

Among the most interesting and indicative of these books is the one being sent out by the Streator Conservatory of Music, which—at Streator, Ill., enjoys a fine reputation and following under the expert guidance of Raymond Burkholder, its president, who is, incidentally, one of the finest of the younger set of American violinists also.

The advisory board of this school is made up of Mr. Burkholder, Charles E. Sindlinger, the well-known singer; Mora Murdock, a Chicago pianist who spends part of her time at Streator; Mrs. E. F. Burkholder, prominent in Woman's Club affairs throughout the state, and A. S. Poole.

From the catalog we copy the following data:

The Streator Conservatory of Music and Dramatic Art was organized in the spring of 1917 by Raymond Burkholder, with enlarged faculty membership in September of that year.

In 1918 new departments were added, and during the summer of that year extensive changes were made to accommodate both teachers and students.

The city press at that time commented on these changes as follows: "The Streator Conservatory of Music, which is located in the Burkholder Building, is now the most pleasantly equipped suite of rooms ever fitted up for such purposes in this city. The remodeling and redecorating which has been done has transformed the rooms so remarkably that one would think he was entering a Chicago school of music when stepping into the reception room."

And also from the local papers: "On Saturday evening a program by the various teachers of the Streator Conservatory of Music and Dramatic Art was given at the Burkholder studios. The pleasant rooms are ideally located and equipped for such a purpose. Streator owes Mr. Raymond Burkholder a debt which is greater than many residents realize for organizing in this city a school of such high standing that it is attracting musical students from many surrounding points."

To further the plans of the management to give the best facilities for music and dramatic art study, and to issue certificates and diplomas in recognition of such study, the school was incorporated under the laws of Illinois in January, 1919.

The instructors include artists who have received their training in America and in other countries. These teachers are men and women of wide experience and extensive general education.

Previous to the organization of the school musical instruction was given in the studios by several of the teachers now associated as members of the faculty.

Many of the students working with these instructors have become accomplished musicians and teachers, and are filling professional places of responsibility in many different localities.

Each year numerous fine programs are given by students and teachers in the studios and before the public. The annual concert is made an event of more importance each succeeding year and large numbers of interested listeners are always in attendance on these occasions. The first annual recital was given by pupils of Raymond Burkholder June 27, 1910. At this time thirty pupils took part in the program, which consisted of ten numbers, solo and ensemble.

The complete faculty list is as follows:

Piano—Miss Mora Murdock, Miss Ida M. Wright, Miss Elizabeth Malcolm, Miss Lulu Mae Yenerich and Mrs. Mina Charlton.

Voice—Charles E. Sindlinger.

Violin—Raymond Burkholder, Miss Grace R. Wright and Miss Louise Dicus.

Pipe Organ—Miss Mora Murdock.

The tour will be directed by the French-American Association for Musical Art.

BUREAU OF FINE ARTS SENDS OUT NINE ARTISTS THIS WEEK

An interesting dress rehearsal took place Wednesday in the recital hall of the Fine Arts Building. Nine young artists from the Bureau of Fine Arts have been organized by Miss Harshbarger of the Century Lyceum Bureau and are known as the Chicago Light Opera Company, booked for a ten weeks' chautauqua tour. The personnel of the company is: Gertrude Farrell and Geneve Cadle, sopranos; Helen Mueller and Anna Braun, contraltos; Raymond Harmon and Edward Schmidt, tenors, and Eugene Sweiser and Omar Wilson, baritone and basso; Allen Coe, accompanist. The program as given Wednesday is the evening program on the road and consists in part of straight concerted and solo numbers and an arrangement of "The Bohemian Girl" in costume and with action. Miss Farrell, Miss Braun, Mr. Sweiser and Mr. Harmon are the principals in the opera, and the entire performance was exceedingly professional.

Special mention should be made of Omar Wilson's original pianologues and his impersonation of Harry Lauder; also it is noted that Mr. Sweiser, in addition to possessing a beautiful voice, is a cellist and banjoist as well, adding the touch of novelty to the program without which no chautauqua audience is entirely satisfied.

Miss Hall intends to keep this octette together as nearly as possible in its present personnel for local work this coming season for clubs, banquets, theaters, churches, etc.

The program was preceded by a short talk by Frank M. Chaffee, president of the Century Lyceum Bureau, and the hall was comfortably filled with guests of the organization and the two bureaus.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE

The student recital heard at the Ziegfeld Theater on Saturday morning brought out the fact that this is a great season at a great school, for nine artist students were presented by nine different teachers of eminence, among them the guest teachers, Leopold Auer, Oscar Saenger, Percy Grainger and Herbert Witherspoon. The diversity of nationalities shown in the personnel of the students also hinted at the far-reaching influence of the school, and added, I thought, a note of romance and charm.

The piano students were all good, and as different as good students can be. Aaron Ascher had all the force and power that attends virile young manhood and held his hearers' utmost attention throughout. He stiffened undeniably on the D Minor Prelude of Chopin, though why I cannot see, for his abandon in "Night Winds" (Griffes) and his style and surety in the B Flat Prelude had argued him a more than capable musician.

To continue with the piano numbers, Miss Kathryn Thomas Whitfield played a Dohnanyi Rhapsody with great richness. The variety with which she invested this selection was rather in the form of shading and well-rounded phrases than of great crescendos. Her playing is intelligent and unafraid.

Cornelia Sampson-Forest, who came at the end of the program, won the wild applause always accorded a well-done descriptive composition. There was real inspiration in her conception of the fascinating "Magic Fire Scene" (Wagner-Brassin), while her technical attainments proved adequate for the most rapid passages.

The child violinist, Evelyn Vitto-Levin, is a talented student of whom any teacher might be proud. She plays with freedom and has a remarkable mastery of her chosen instrument. The Tschaikowsky Concerto (First Movement) is usually intrusted to these of more mature years, capable of the largest tone work and possessed of the most deep-seated emotions, but Miss Vitto-Levin's interpretation was faultless as far as it went and gave magnificent promise for the future.

The difficult "Devil's Trill" (Tartini) was excellently played by Max Olanoff of Philadelphia. In Mr. Olanoff it is easy to recognize "the spark," and, given a few years either of study or of solo experience, he will be found in the high places with the best. He played with great musical feeling, indicative of the high-minded artist rather than the mere musical apprentice.

Of vocal numbers there were four, namely, Leona Kramer, who exemplifies the careful student and has possibilities, too; Miss Solidad Rindon, whose native familiarity with the Latin languages gave her clarity and distinct charm in the "Shadow Song" ("Dinorah"), by Meyerbeer; Mr. Arthur Blight, a delightful baritone singer from Canada, who is already a successful singer and very good to listen to, and a soprano of splendid attainments, Mary Louise Bowen, who sang from "Carmen" to the delight of every one present.

LOUISE MORRIS.

CHARLOTTE DEMUTH WILLIAMS

Mrs. Charlotte Demuth Williams, the Oberlin violiniste, together with her husband, Chauncey Lawrence Williams, and their eldest son, Chauncey Lawrence Jr., are the guests of Mrs. Adamson and Miss Lena Adamson at their island summer home in Georgian Bay, Canada.

Miss Adamson and Miss Demuth were classmates at the Royal Conservatory of Music at Leipsic during their student years, under Hans Sitt, the eminent composer and violin teacher.

Mrs. Adamson and Miss Lena, mother and daughter, are prominent teachers in the Toronto Conservatory of Music.

An unusual coincidence of the reunion of these three artist-teachers is the co-assemblage of three mighty fine fiddles—Mrs. Adams possessing a fine Strad., Miss Adams a lovely Amato and Mrs. Williams a Lorenzo Guadagnini.

Mrs. Williams has relinquished her teaching engagement at the Oberlin Conservatory of Music and will devote much of her time to recital work and other professional playing.

EDITH POTTER SMITH

Edith Potter Smith substituted for Harrison Wild on Sunday, July 13, at Grace Episcopal Church. She played the Adagio from the Fifth Sonata (Guilmant), "Te Deum Laudamus" (Claussman), "Lento Espressivo" (Ketebey) and Collins' "Festal March." Miss Smith, who is an organist in Kankakee, Ill., acquitted herself with distinction and proved to be a musician of marked talent and possessing the full degree of poise necessary to a successful church organist.

Mr. Rene Lund, who was the soloist, sang with his usual presence and in more than usually good voice. He is one of Chicago's best church singers, putting strength and dignity and knowledge into his work.

Mrs. Estelle Mandeville has been acting dean of this school, but upon her departure to make Davenport, Iowa, her permanent home, Lyravine Votaw has taken her place. It is a live school and is planning a number of new features for the coming season.

Miss Votaw was in her studio this summer until the middle of August, when she leaves for several weeks of lectures in Illinois and Indiana before teachers' institutes.

JOHN RANKEL

Pupils of John Rankel were presented last Wednesday night in a very interesting program in the parlors of the Rundle School of Music. Those who appeared were Mrs. Arthur Temple, Mr. Joseph Lincoln, Miss Alice Schliessmann and Mrs. Dora Christopher.

Mrs. Temple possesses a lyric voice of much beauty. Mr. Lincoln was fervent and dramatic in his interpretations, and Miss Schliessmann was very pretty and her voice impressive, both in her solo numbers and in the duet group with Mr. Rankel at the close. Mrs. Christopher's voice was of a rich, velvety contralto quality, which, though not always true, could not but be admired.

Assisting the soloists was Mr. Ben Zimberoff, who played the violin with a great deal of vim and with good technical command. Miss Grace Grove distinguished herself as usual at the piano.

He sang with great finish and effectiveness before a highly appreciative audience. His work is always artistic and, moreover, is characterized by a grateful variety of effect that insures against monotony, the curse with which so many singers afflict their audiences.

PSYCHOLOGICAL PRINCIPLES AND SCHOOL MUSIC

Since the word psychology is better understood than the word pedagogy, I prefer the use of the former. Pedagogy is merely the application of psychological principles to the art of teaching.

Psychology is a science, and teaching is an art. Teaching must always agree with psychology, but there are many methods of teaching which may equally well agree with psychological laws. Hence when a teacher arises who says, "My method is right and is the only method that is right," should there exist such a teacher, it is a dangerous attitude to assume.

Teachers in all branches rightfully turn to psychology for radical help in their profession. That much is gained is proven by the so-called "new education" which has made such strides in the past few years; and still there is among many in the teaching profession a misunderstanding and a certain mystification when the terms psychology and pedagogy are used.

The new education is based upon respect and even reverence for humanity. In all teaching let spirit be uppermost and mechanism subordinate to it. Stress the importance of the child rather than the subject matter.

The problems of education can be worked out only by the help of psychology, physiology, sociology, ethics, the sciences all, and, in addition, existing local conditions.

Teachers who are thoroughly pedagogic in all other respects often overlook the fact that existing local conditions must always be considered in applying psychological principles to teaching methods.

One of our best psychologists says: "The final test of a method is not 'Can arguments be made in its favor?' but 'Will it work?'"

Methods which may work most successfully in the private music studio, even in class lessons, and may be thoroughly pedagogical, and thus be based upon psychological principles, might be wholly unsuitable for use in the schoolroom. Methods which have been tried and found successful in the schoolroom would probably be much less valuable in the private studio. A fine teacher is one who can adapt these certain principles to existing local conditions and derive methods which will supply the need for the time and place and the child.

A poor teacher is one who uses some set, cut-and-dried device for every need. Normal teachers must necessarily give to students inexperienced in the teaching art not only the knowledge of the subject to be taught, but certain methods and devices which the experienced teacher has found successful. With these applications of true psychological principles the young teacher begins her experiences in order to have some concrete methods of work or of imparting her subject matter. She must feel, however, the principles to be of far greater importance than the method, and that the child is the root of the principle.

The progressive teacher soon learns, too, that methods must change or be adapted in a different way for individual classrooms of even the same grade.

Hence discriminating judgment, tact and the study of existing local conditions must be an ever-present part of a teacher's equipment.

The conditions found in a schoolroom in the average school building differ in many ways from those found in a private studio for the teaching of music. In the latter a piano is usually at the disposal of the teacher to use when she sees fit. The ear observation is greatly aided by the instrument because harmonic feeling, chord feeling and key feeling or tonality are thus established in a different manner than is possible in a schoolroom where no instrument is available.

Where all the ear dictation must be given by a single voice there must necessarily be some articulated word or syllable used to label the tone for easier recognition in learning tonal relationship and interval feeling. The merely vocalized hum or neutral syllable does not suffice for ears yet untrained to difference in pitch. The figures 1, 2, 3, 4 belonging to the scale tones may be used, but many of them are not as singable as they should be, and one has two syllables which are awkward to use with even time. The pitches A, B, C may be sung, but again we find outside of the scale of C that more than one syllable must in many cases be used to represent the pitch, and these have the additional shortcoming of not definitely aiding in key feeling or tonal relationship. Up to the present time there seems to be nothing to quite fill the bill at the point of ear observation but the syllables long used, as do, re, mi. These are used as a step in a method, not a theory. They were for years used to an extreme, no doubt, and have thus fallen into disfavor; and as soon as the schoolroom finds another method that attains better results at this one point in giving tonal relationship, key feeling and interval feeling, in the second grade, which bridges the connection between the rote song and sight singing, every progressive teacher will be glad to try it as she has tried many others that have claimed to do so.

Do, re, mi are labels for quick recognition of tones. A class of music in school is composed of from forty to fifty children, with much, average, little, or no musical intelligence or ear. As careful gradations as possible must be made, but even so, different adaptations of the work must be made.

Well do I remember of going, when a child, into my father's study and finding fastened above his desk a tiny disc of purple paper and one of lavender, with the name of its shade printed below it. They aroused my childish curiosity, and in answer to my inquiries father said that he had learned that the two shades were different, although they had looked exactly alike to him. He decided to train his eye to see the difference and so placed them where his eye would fall upon them each time he looked up from his desk. Had they not been identified in some way by name he might have looked at them for years without learning which was lavender and which purple, although in time they looked different to his eye.

In much the same way we find the use of the singing syllable an aid in labeling and identifying the tones during the first study in ear observation. When the key feeling and tonal relationship are thoroughly established the "syllables" are no longer needed.

One of the standard textbooks on psychology ends with some such words as the following: "After all the discussion of the subject of this book, we close with psychology in its experimental stages, and we know very little about it." This is at first thought something of a disappointment, after having read a book with keen interest and care and having weighed well each thought given; but again it gives one the assurance that we are pushing on to better things ahead, and it behooves every true teacher to feel that she has never reached the best.

Although progress and results of the study have been remarkable in the short time of its existence, it is still in its early stages. Before school work can be definitely affected, much remains to be done in standardizing results and in making these available for the classroom teacher of music as of other subjects.

A workman who handles tools in fine watchmaking and other things of as delicate construction is always glad to find a new tool which claims great things achieved, and is ready to try it in his shop. The kind of watches he handles or the kind of repairs needed upon them may not admit of the use of this tool with any success whatever. He has learned to select his tools according to conditions found in his shop.

As teachers we must be as discriminating in the selection of our tools or methods for the training of the young in music.

From Moore's "What Is Education?" I quote: "Method is the orderly routine to be followed in seeking to accomplish definite results." "Methods are wrong because purposes are not clear."

As teachers in the schoolroom we cannot clarify ideas or make important ideas in the lesson definite unless our purposes are clear in our own minds. To enter a room with no definite outline in mind for the twenty, thirty or forty-five minutes to be spent there is certainly to leave the pupil with no definite ideas as a result. Just to sing is a joy, but it is not the educative influence that it might be if coupled with observation, exploration and conclusions drawn, that the next singing may contain more joy and added inspiration.

Questioning is the most important instrument used by the teacher in classroom exercises. This subject will be discussed widely in a later writing.

The child learns to sing by singing just as one learns to swim by jumping into the water and subjecting one's self to the way of the waves. Some people naturally swim to prevent drowning; others need much instruction and aid. One grows or develops only by doing.

Self-activity and initiative, the development of originality and resourcefulness in pupils, is one of the important and difficult achievements. It is one of those superior qualities that we as teachers, with our dominating and controlling influence, are inclined to overlook.

These things we shall achieve if we "let spirit be uppermost and mechanism subordinate to it."

NANCE D. THOMPSON

Mrs. Nance D. Thompson, the teacher and coach of Sam W. Thompson, who has been soloist at Trinity Episcopal Church (1918-1919), has gone to La Belle, Mo., for two months, taking charge of a large class there in voice and dramatic art. Mrs. Thompson had a flourishing music school in La Belle before she brought her young son to Chicago to put him into choir work. She has been one of the vocal teachers, training especially boys' voices, in the Lyceum Arts Conservatory the past year. During the last few months she has placed several boys in good choir positions, one being the solo boy, Master Langley, from Desplaines, Ill., who has taken Sam Thompson's place in Trinity Church.

These boys will study with Mrs. Thompson this coming season, which begins in September, at the Lyceum Arts Conservatory, Chicago.

PAUL MORENZO

Paul Morenzo is still busy concertizing. He could not yet close up his New York studio to enjoy the sea or mountain air during the present hot weather, as he is compelled to fill a number of concert engagements.

His manager, Miss Annie Friedberg, received a "hurried call" by long distance from Philadelphia to have him give a recital before the Society of the Friends of Music on their special July 4 celebration, and on July 6 he appeared with the Symphony Orchestra in Atlantic City. This eminent tenor, who has been living in Canada during the last few years, is rapidly coming back to his own. At a concert in New York last week, after singing a group of four numbers, the enthusiastic audience insisted on two encores. The many inquiries for his artistic services look very promising for a busy coming concert season.

WINONA LAKE ASSEMBLY

There will be a fine program of lectures and music at Winona Lake, Ind., throughout the Summer, the latter culminating on August 13 and 14; on the first named date "The Creation" will be sung under the direction of H. W. Owens, and on the second the annual musical contest will be held all day and evening.

AMERICAN CONSERVATORY NOTES

The hosts of admirers of David Bispham will be delighted to hear that he has consented to appear at the fifth and last of the American Conservatory series of Summer recitals, at Kimball Hall on Wednesday morning, July 23, at 11 o'clock, where he will read "The Raven," by Edgar Allen Poe, and sing a group of songs.

On the same occasion Heniot Levy will play two groups of piano selections, and Mrs. Marie Partridge Price, a San Francisco artist of note, as well as Miss Jennie F. W. Johnson, our own well-known contralto, will sing. Both of these artists have been coaching with Mr. Bispham this Summer.

The attendance of students at this season's Summer session of the American Conservatory is exceedingly large, being double that of previous seasons.

COLORATURAS OF TODAY

Macbeth and Garrison, American Singers, and Galli-Curci, the Italian Diva, Compared With Tetrazzini

An interesting commentary, in view of the possible coming of Luisa Tetrazzini to this country for the fall season, is seen in the observations of Frederick Donaghey, the music critic of the Chicago Tribune, bearing date of June 1. Having had an excellent opportunity to hear Tetrazzini at her best, as well as those singers of her class who today dominate the operatic and concert field, he considers the latter superior to the sensation of nearly a decade ago. It is gratifying to note, too, that of the three mentioned two of them, Florence Macbeth and Mabel Garrison, are America's own products. The following is the Chicago Tribune's commentary:

"Luisa Tetrazzini, held high in idolatry hereabouts for a season or so, is to come back in the autumn, not to resume with the Chicago Opera, it is hardly necessary to say, and not, perhaps, to go with the Metropolitan. She was not, at her best, one of the great; she was just better than Barrientos, who just missed connecting with the Chicago Opera six years ago. But Tetrazzini came along at a time when the opposition was negligible, with Melba nearly through and Sembrich faded. Coloraturas today are nearly as numerous as young violinists who were taught by Auer; and those who really matter musically are Galli-Curci, Mabel Garrison and Florence Macbeth.

"Few singers—and it is extremely doubtful if there are any others—possess the genius of being able to please music lovers in concert field as well as on the operatic stage as does Florence Macbeth. Possessed of a magnetic personality, charming presence, and wonderful voice, she stands alone in the concert field as one who from the first note to the last captivates her audience and keeps them under the spell of her melody. Her triumphs in concert follow each other with gratifying regularity, the latest achievement being in her own home state, where the house was sold out on the first day of booking, and even after the stage was filled hundreds had to be turned away. And then they wanted her to repeat the recital the next day, which is easily understood from the following criticisms of the local press:

Nightingale Could Scarcely Rival Florence Macbeth—Recalled Eight Times After an Encore Song

"'Florence Macbeth, Minnesota nightingale, was tendered a most royal welcome when she appeared in concert last evening at Mankato Theater before a capacity audience, and held them in charmed admiration of her art throughout an interesting and varied program. Every seat in the house was sold out, and seats had been arranged on the stage for people who had been unable to obtain other seats.

"'Gracious and unassuming as ever, Miss Macbeth appeared before her audience and acknowledged the applause which greeted her with a smile for "Her own home people." Anyone in the large audience which heard her last night would not wonder that she has been christened "Minnesota Nightingale," for after hearing her sing the "Polonaise" from "Mignon," by Thomas, or the wonderful "Bell Song," from "Lakme," by Delibes, they would understand that a nightingale could scarcely rival the wonderful runs and trills, and exquisite graduations of which Miss Macbeth's beautiful coloratura soprano voice is capable. Without apparent effort her tones are under perfect control, and she does as she chooses with her perfectly trained voice. The "Polonaise" was her first number, and she sang it as only Macbeth could sing it, and, independent of piano accompaniment, warbled the brilliant runs into the triumphant high notes, and the sweetly modulated tones of the lower ones, to the delight of her appreciative audience. She was enthusiastically recalled, and was obliged to return to the stage twice to bow to her admirers. She then sang a group of four, the first being "Quel Ruscelletto," by Paradise. After this number beautiful bouquets of roses were carried to her, and during the evening she received a large number of arm bouquets of roses and a box of violets, all of which she placed upon the piano, the mass of blossoms completely covering the piano top.'

"'Other selections of the first group were "Care Selve" and "What's Sweeter Than a New Blown Rose," by Handel, and "The Plague of Love," by Arne. Hearty applause greeted each number, and at the conclusion she was recalled to the stage twice, responding with a characteristic little encore song, "The Cuckoo Clock," and being recalled twice again. "Caro Nome," from "Rigoletto," by Verdi, gave an opportunity for the display of the wonderful range of the singer's voice, and was brilliant with all the effective runs and trills of which an artistic singer is capable. Following two recalls, Miss Macbeth sang "The Page's Aria," from the "Masked Ball," and was again recalled.'

"'She then sang a group of four: "Values," by Vanderpool; "If," by MacFadyen; "A Sonnet," by James Bliss, and "In Italy," by Boyd. The "Sonnet," a song of tender sentiment, was especially pleasing and was given with sympathetic expression. In response to two curtain calls, Miss Macbeth sang an amusing little "Fairy Tale," and was recalled again and again, the applause developing into an ovation. After the second recall, Miss Macbeth sang another encore song. She was recalled at least eight times at this point in the program, and was obliged to twice repeat one little encore song, all about building a strong box and locking troubles and cares away inside. Someone called for "Annie Laurie," and Miss Macbeth smiled and promised, "Annie Laurie's coming."'

"'The latter part of the program opened with the "Bell Song," from "Lakme," by Delibes, one of Miss Macbeth's favorites, giving an opportunity for a display of wonderful runs and coloratura effects, and a chance to show what her beautiful voice is capable of. From the clear, high notes, the apex of a real soprano voice, to the lower tones, Miss Macbeth's voice, like the spirit of melody, permeated the auditorium again and again, and sang as an encore "Annie Laurie." As the piano sounded the first notes of the well-known song the audience broke into applause, which was hushed as Miss Macbeth began to sing, and which was resumed as the last notes of the song died away. As a second encore Miss Macbeth sang "Comin' Through the Rye," and, being recalled to the stage three times again, she sang "The Last Rose of Summer," the sweetest song of all. But the audience would not be satisfied and recalled her twice again until she responded by singing "Home, Sweet Home," a song that never fails to make its heart appeal, and was sung with wonderful expressiveness by Miss Macbeth.'"

CHARLES M. COURBOIN

Announcement has just been made of the appointment of Charles M. Courboin as official organist for the Wanamaker organs in Philadelphia and New York for the season of 1919-20.

Mr. Courboin gave a notable recital on the great Wanamaker Philadelphia organ on March 27 together with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski. This event was attended by more than twelve thousand people and proved to be one of the most noteworthy and significant events in the recent history of American music. Immediately following this event negotiations were opened by the Wanamaker interests through Alexander Russell, concert director of the Wanamaker stores and music director of Princeton University, with Mr. Courboin which have terminated successfully.

Mr. Courboin will give a cycle of organ recitals on the Wanamaker organs numbering perhaps forty in all. Those on the Philadelphia instrument will begin in September and those on the New York instrument, now being reconstructed and enlarged, as soon as the instrument is ready, which will probably not be before January. The New York instrument is being rebuilt under Mr. Courboin's direct supervision and will be the finest tonally in the metropolis, it is believed.

Mr. Courboin will also retain his present position as organist of the First Baptist Church of Syracuse and will do a limited amount of concert work, though his new duties will prevent him from giving much time to outside recitals.

The Philadelphia organ of 232 stops is the largest in the United States; the New York organ of 120 stops will be the largest in that city, and the Syracuse organ is the largest in New York state outside of the metropolis. It will be indeed a distinction for one man to have the honor to play three such magnificent instruments and to be the highest paid organist in America, which doubtless means in the world.

Too much credit can not be given to the firm of John Wanamaker for its service to the cause of music in undertaking these notable recitals. They are all to be held in the evening, according to present plans, and the public of the two great eastern cities will have an unequaled opportunity to hear two magnifiecent instruments played by an organ virtuoso whose virile and brilliant work has won him public commendation in a most remarkable way during the past three years.

PETERBOROUGH, N. H.

Eleventh Biennial of the N. F. M. C. a Great Success—Peterborough an Ideal Spot—Mrs. MacDowell a Fine Hostess—Many American Compositions Presented by American Artists—Reappearance of Christine Miller—Florence Macbeth, Harold Henry, Arthur Kraft and Frederick Gunster Fill Prominent Places—Scores of Artists and Speakers Appear

BY A DELEGATE

For more than a week the little town of Peterborough, N. H., and the surrounding countryside have overflowed with delegates and visitors to the eleventh biennial of the N. F. M. C. Every home and every hotel within a ten-mile radius has been called into service to house the crowds that have come from all parts of the country. The buildings at the MacDowell colony have overflowed with delegates and tents on the grounds had to be used at times as sleeping quarters. The staging of so large an undertaking in so small a town has been a big problem. That it has been done successfully is due to the indefatigable efforts of Mrs. Edward MacDowell. She is used to accomplishing the seemingly impossible. She has been everywhere, done everything, thought for everybody. She has met every train, greeted personally every officer and delegate; has made clever, brainy speeches, has played the piano with her usual charm, has been, in short, the dominating figure of the convention.

The first public meeting took place on Sunday afternoon at the pageant grounds, when simple, dignified exercises marked the dedication of the permanent seats—a gift of the federation to the MacDowell Memorial Association, and the presentation, by a member of the federation, of a bronze memorial tablet. Appropriate speeches were made by Mrs. Ochsner, Mrs. MacDowell, Mrs. Sieberling, Dr. Norman Bridge and Mrs. Benjamin Prince. There was also community singing.

The first evening concert, on Monday, June 30, brought forward the young artist contestants for the federation prizes, in a program that lasted four hours. It is unfortunate that more care was not shown in choosing the numbers used. In most cases they were too long. Much excellence of talent and training was shown. The prize-winners were Arthur Klein, pianist, of New York; Terry Ferrill, violinist, of Wichita, Kas. (a pupil of Ralph Brokaw), and Miss Ruth Hutchinson, soprano, of Los Angeles. The contest was ably managed by Mrs. Louis E. Yager of Oak Park, Ill., chairman of the Young Professionals' Club and artists' contest.

ONE OF THE STUDIOS, MACDOWELL COLONY

Tuesday afternoon brought the first performance of the Peterborough Pageant, a performance that must linger in the minds of all those who saw it as one of indescribable beauty. The text of the pageant (which has been printed in Music News) gives the scenes that were acted and sung with earnestness and finish against a natural background of pines, with Mt. Monadnock in the distance. All taking part in it are deserving of highest praise, the townspeople, the conductor of the orchestra, Howard Barlow—who was responsible for much of the effective orchestration of the music used—John R. Froome Jr. of Cincinnati, director (who also rewrote much of the text and rearranged most of the scenes).

Zelina de Maclot, who sang the principal solos, was heard to excellent advantage. Lada's Indian Dances, to music written by Charles S. Skilton (of the University of Kansas), and played during the last two seasons by most of the leading orchestras of the country, were fine exhibitions of her beautiful art. Of the actors, all of them amateurs (most of them residents of Peterborough), the remarkable work of Miss Emily Baetz in an old-woman part must be singled out for splendid praise. The MacDowell music, effectively orchestrated, was of haunting beauty and was in large measure responsible for the emotion that most of us felt many times during the afternoon. It did much to create the element of pathos that pervaded the loveliness of this ensemble of nature and fine art.

At Tuesday evening's concert an all-American program was given by Margaret Hoberg, harpist, and F. Marion Ralston, pianist, playing their own compositions, and the orchestra, under the conductorship of W. H. Humiston, playing the latter's Suite in F sharp minor; the "Song of the New England Birds," from Edgar Stillman Kelley's scholarly "New England" Symphony, and Henry F. Gilbert's clever and popular "Humoresque on Negro Minstrel Themes."

Wednesday afternoon's program was opened by Hamlin Garland in a sincere and interesting talk on "MacDowell's Ideals." It was at this concert that Mrs. MacDowell consented to speak about the MacDowell music and play some of it. She did both to the great delight of the audience. She interpreted the prelude to the Second Piano Suite, "To the Sea" and "To a Wild Rose," with understanding, skill and her characteristic charm. Mrs. MacDowell was followed on the program by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who played her own dainty and very pleasing Suite, "Les Reves au Columbine." It was delightful music, delightfully played, and Mrs. Beach was deservedly applauded long and loudly and was forced to play an additional number. The Berkshire string quartet played the prize-winning quartet by Henry Holden Huss, a well-written work of interest and of considerable beauty. In response to enthusiastic applause Mr. Huss made a second success with a clever impromptu speech. The quartet played also Op. 18, No. 5, of Beethoven. From a musical standpoint the concert of Wednesday evening was the crowning event of the week. It can be judged by the most critical standards. It was opened by a stirring performance of Rossitter Cole's well written and well sounding "Pioneer" Overture, which was made known to Chicago audiences last season by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. It was splendidly conducted by the composer, who, at its completion, was called out at least five times. He deserved all the applause he received. The enthusiasm aroused by the Cole overture was maintained throughout the evening and rose to greatest intensity after Harold Henry's superb playing of the MacDowell D minor Concerto. The Cole number was followed by an effective and melodious suite for orchestra by Edward Ballentine, a gifted composer. Then followed Harold Henry in the concerto. A more electrifying performance of this work can not be imagined. It had complete mastery of every detail. There was perfection of technic, beauty of tone, power, poetry, authority and titanic power. Henry carried the audience by storm—and it was an audience that held many of the country's most distinguished musicians. It gave Henry a tremendous ovation, one that was well deserved. Lewis M. Isaacs, the composer, a pupil of Edward MacDowell, said that since the latter played it he had heard no one get just the same "lilt" into the last movement.

CHRISTINE MILLER-CLEMSON

As an encore Mr. Henry played the "Ecossaises" of Beethoven. Much praise must be given Howard Barlow for the able manner in which he conducted the difficult orchestra score. Mr. Henry insisted upon bringing him forward after each movement of the concerto. He is a gifted youth, for whom it is safe to predict a big future. As William Arms Fisher remarked, it was cheering to hear two nice, clean Americans give such a performance.

Christine Miller Clemson emerged from private life for two appearances at this concert, at which she sang two groups by American composers. Of her singing only superlatives can be used. It was perfect. Vocally, interpretatively and dramatically, she has mastered her art. She was a joy to the ear and to the eye. She was given the reception she deserved and shared the applause that followed every song with its composer, if present. Of the songs, A. Walter Kramer's "Dark and Wondrous Night" and "The Grey Wolf" of H. T. Burleigh deserve special mention. Arthur Foote's "Four Poems After Omar Khayyam" for orchestra had a fine performance under the conductorship of the composer and brought an unusual concert, that had contained for the audience many thrills, to an impressive close.

ARTHUR KRAFT

On Thursday afternoon was given the second performance of the pageant, and in the evening a concert, at which Zelina de Maclot, Arthur Kraft and George Raseley sang. Pasquale Tallarico played and the orchestra was conducted by Howard Barlow and W. H. Humiston. The outstanding work was the singing of Arthur Kraft and of George Raseley and the composition the latter sang—Barlow's "Song of Idas"—of which both the singer and the orchestra gave a spirited performance, under the composer's direction. Mr. Tallarico, a native of New Hampshire and a former federation prize-winner, played a group by Lewis M. Isaacs and the first movement of the Tschaikowsky Concerto in B flat minor. Mr. Kraft, known to every Chicagoan as the possessor of a beautiful voice and fine musicianship, and who is just now living temporarily in New York, created a very fine impression with excellently chosen songs by the Americans—Cadman, Arthur Nevin, Winter Watts, Burleigh, Squire and McGill. Mr. Kraft was one of the big successes of the week. He has much natural talent.

Friday brought another performance at the Pageant Stage, singing by the West Peterborough Woman's and Children's Choruses, solos by Zelina de Maclot, dances by Lada and orchestra numbers under Arthur Nevins' leadership. Many noted speakers have been heard during the convention. None has made a better impression than has Florence Macbeth. Among those who have addressed meetings have been Frederick Gimster (also pronouncedly successful), Mrs. Frank Seiberling, Mrs. W. I. Steele and Mrs. Oberndorfer. The results of the election have not yet been announced. There can be no question of the success of the convention when one remembers the pageant and the work of Harold Henry, Christine Miller, Arthur Kraft and many others. ST. PAUL, MINN.

By MYRTLE WEED

Of the many beautiful lakes which the Twin Cities boast, Phalen Park, in St. Paul, was the setting on the Fourth of July for one of the largest municipal celebrations ever staged here. Thirty thousand persons were said to have packed the amphitheater or hillside in front of the outdoor stage. More than five hundred newly made citizens of the United States attended the Americanization program and were welcomed by Mayor Hodgson and Judge E. M. Orr.

More than fourteen nationalities, depicting America's melting pot, were represented in the evening pageant, which was in charge of Miss Katherine Farrington. "The Spirit of the League of Nations" was featured as one of the scenes. A large number of local Greeks enacted tableaux. Syrian, Scotch, Irish and folk dances of many other nations were given, with elaborate costuming. Pages of American history were set forth in the shifting scenes representing American Indians, soldiers and many great characters in history.

The music of the bands, the Albrecht Concert Band at Como Park, with Fred G. Albrecht, director, and the Minnesota State Band at Phalen Park, A. L. Synder, director, rank as the popular attractions of the outing season.

The remarkable success of W. W. Norton, St. Paul song organizer, identified with the Soldiers and Sailors' Club, has been widely recognized. As community sing leader he has gone to New York to take charge of the work during the month of July, while the New York organizer is away.

On his way to New York Mr. Norton went to Grand Forks, N. D., for organization work in connection with the homecoming celebration there on the Fourth of July.

The songs of Beatrice MacGowan Scott, the Chicago composer who has recently come here to live, are becoming great favorites. The song, "Joy," was introduced to St. Paulites when Mabel Garrison sang it at her recital for the Schubert Club at the People's Church. Mrs. Scott has caught the rhythmic swing of the words by Sarah Teasdale, and with a melody of fine style and character she has provided a lilting accompaniment, rhythmically superb and beautiful.

A new song published by Summy, called the "Wood Song," will win its way. It was recently sung with success by Lucile Brown Duxbury.

Two books of Children's Songs, by Mrs. Scott, are used extensively in public schools, and violin solos and sacred songs number among her works.

Harvey Officer, of the Order of the Holy Cross of New York, was a guest in the city for ten days. Father Officer writes for the Holy Cross Magazine, has written on musical subjects, and devotes considerable time to composition. A number of his compositions have been published in the magazine. A recent one is a beautiful setting of the poem by Alfred Noyes, "What Does It Take to Make a Rose"? He has chosen texts by Noyes and Chesterton to a large extent: "The Donkey" (Chesterton), introducing the Palm Sunday Hymn, "All Glory, Laud and Honor," is a most worthy number; "The Barrel Organ," which suggests the operas "Trovatore" and "Traviata," also introduces the lovely "Lilac Time in London." The spoken word with musical accompaniment is exceedingly attractive in Father Officer's hands.

Another guest in the city whose playing has been greatly enjoyed is Elizabeth Morton Drorshak, pianist, composer and accompanist of Duluth. Mrs. Drorshak visited here after attending the Minnesota Music Teachers' Convention at Northfield, where she was accompanist for Lucille Brown Duxbury. The clearness of her execution and fine artistry made the Debussy numbers which she played most fascinating.

The Fantasie Impromptu (Chopin), Rigaudon (MacDowell), and compositions by another Duluth composer were among those greatly enjoyed.

The following program was recently given in aid for the American Women's Hospitals, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crosby:

THE WORK OF WOMEN ORGANISTS

A Paper Read at the Minnesota Convention at Northfield by Mrs. F. E. Church of Owatonna

The Apostle Paul is held responsible for many of the limitations placed upon women, and his admonitions that women should keep silent in the churches was doubtless the beginning of the traditions which women have had to overcome to obtain the positions as organists they now so successfully hold.

The Roman Church and the Church of England have been most obdurate, but now women are admitted to many of the finest positions offered to organists. The fact that practically all organ music centered in and around the Church left little outside to encourage women in the study of the instrument. When they made their first attempts they found many obstacles confronting them; the chief one was the physical inability to manipulate the cumbersome, unwieldy, old mechanisms. In this connection, it may be assumed that women have been indirectly the inspiration of some of the vast improvements made in the mechanism of the organ.

Years ago, when the question as to the necessary qualifications of the successful organist was asked, knowledge of the subject was largely theoretical. It is interesting to propound the same questions to some of the great organists today and to compare their ideas with those of yesterday; to learn how experience in the art has solved the problems of the earlier years.

It is also interesting to note the different opinions regarding the playing ability of women organists, as expressed by those upon whose judgment we are pleased to depend.

It is the belief of some people that the organ is too masculine an instrument for women to play, too strenuous physically, and that it is impossible for them to give the amount of pleasure in proportion with the immense amount of physical and mental application which any degree of skill in playing necessitates.

Critics tell us that women organists lack color and dash and originality in registration which is gained by the intimate knowledg of instrumentation and orchestral writing—that the masculine mind is better qualified to meet these demands.

This all leads to interesting argument. However, when we remember the magnificent recitals given in recent years by our men artists, we must graciously and generously admit that they deserve the honors in the concert field that they now indisputably hold.

Lest women be unjustly limited, let us take thought and cast about a bit. The most brilliant performer in the concert world may not be the most successful organist. The church organist, for example. What peculiar attributes must he possess? To please the varied constituents of one-all-the-year-round audience is a problem in truth. The music must be sufficiently involved and representative to please the most exacting listener, at the same time so simple as to appeal to the aged and those of more limited learning—a task which calls for a peculiar versatility. The choir in a large church today represents as many problems as there are members in the organization.

To sustain a perfectly balanced and working unit and to gain the desired results in the midst of present-day exactions and demands means a task which calls for genuine interest, sterling character, strong personality and fine musicianship. To this great task are women as well as men organists and directors most successfully responding. Woman, in the past, by nature and by education, may have lacked the courage of her convictions, but other qualities of mind are hers in fine proportion. Her natural curiosity becomes an asset and inspires her in the search of knowledge. Imagination is a subtle and potent power in the work of the organist. We have believed men not so richly gifted in these finer and more mystic and spiritual qualities, but we grant that they are making telling use of all those they possess.

Our habits in music have been largely imported, and Europe has been slow indeed in recognition of women organists. This attitude is changing rapidly, and we find in England today Rosalind Ellicott, daughter of the Bishop of Gloucester, holding one of the fine church positions and prominent in concert work. Dr. Ethel Symeth, a prominent suffragette, herself an organist, has been striving for over thirty years to obtain recognition for women musicians and professional women in general. Progress has been made, and there are many notable organists among women in Europe and in America, but as yet none of them have endeavored to create a fashion for "Women Concert Organists." The present decade offers the organist new and widening fields.

The moving pictures and municipal music offer wonderful opportunities, fields in which the influence of good music is great beyond all possibilities of estimation.

God created the art for the uplift and pleasure of His people, and the mightiest of all instruments is the one from which the people have the right to expect the greatest pleasure. A new era is dawning, and women, grown strong and self-reliant in the service to their country during the great war, have found new determination and new courage. Is it not consistent to predict that the woman organist, so rapidly coming into her own, will find her sphere in the spiritual uplift of humanity. And the art of playing will become elevated to the highest ministry, and the King of Instruments, in corresponding measure, lifted to its most exalted position.

As to Our Directory Columns

The name of every Musician in the United States—every Composer, every Manager, every Publisher, every Teacher, every School, and every Manufacturer of Music Instruments, should be in the Classified Directory Columns of THE MUSIC NEWS.

It is a fact today that Managers, Directors of Schools, Program Committees, Festival Directors, Lyceum Promoters—in fact, everybody who has to do with Musicians, has formed the habit, when the address of a Musician is wanted, of looking in our Directory Columns for it.

We have been told again and again,

"Your Directory Is the Most Useful List Published in the United States"

Even if you have no intention of doing more public work—even though you are located where no change seems possible—it is still advisable to have your name in our columns in order that your friends, the managers, the publishers and the public at large may have a ready means of finding your address.

And—if you ARE in the field for increased engagements or activities of any kind you will find no medium so useful as this.

We have Classifications for every Instrument, for the Voice, for Publishers, Manufacturers, Composers, Directors, Ensembles, Theory Teachers, Dancing, Dramatic Art, Clubs, Choir Boy Training, Pageantry, Community Singing Directors, Managers, Accompanists, Public School Music Teachers, and others.

If we have not your Classification we will create a Department for you.

The cost of this service is only fifteen dollars a year, but the service itself is invaluable.

During the last season we carried in the Classified Columns hundreds of names. We want to carry additional hundreds this season, and expect to make the list as near complete as we possibly can.

Payment for this service can be made Annually, Semi-Annually or Quarterly—and, as we send THE MUSIC NEWS to each one whose name is in these columns, you need have no further expense for subscription.

Display Advertising in MUSIC NEWS is considered today the most useful in America, and you will—eventually—be in the field for that. But, meantime, you should not delay one week in having your name in our Classified Directory Columns, for this is AN INVALUABLE SERVICE.

PRACTICAL MUSIC QUESTIONS OF THE MOMENT

An Address Delivered Before the Minnesota Music Teachers' Association at Northfield by Charles E. Watt and Reproduced Here by Request of the Officers

PART III

The Commercialization of Music

But, important as is the democratization of music, and vital as is the subject of Americanization of it, there is still a more important item for consideration of the professional musician, and that is the commercialization of music.

The democratization of the art will bring it right home to the people and will eventually create a greater field of operation for the man who makes his living out of music, and the Americanization of music will put under it that solid foundation and that impulse which will make it a very part of the life of the times and will keep it stable for all time to come.

But, unless the musician learns to put money values on music—unless he insists upon it that he is as worthy of his hire as any other worker, and that it is just as important that he live as that any other man lives—all the talk on the other two divisions of our subject will avail nothing, and music will suffer a still further decline in this country.

I say "a still further decline" because, in spite of some very optimistic talk a few years ago about the wonderful status of music in America, and some very wonderful compilations of figures showing that we, as a country, have spent untold millions for music, it is my belief that music has not yet attained a very high place in the regard of the country.

For most of the money that was spent up to war times was given to the foreigners, and the appreciation of the American public for the achievements of the American musician was not anything like what it should have been.

And all this grew out of the fact that musicians have never been commercial enough—they have never felt that the money side of their profession was of equal importance with the art side.

There is something about music which makes its practitioners timid about demanding their rights to adequate payment.

The layman will, I know, laugh at this statement, and will cite the cases of Patti, Jenny Lind, Mary Garden, John McCormack, Galli-Curci and others to prove that musicians have and do receive vast sums for their work.

As a matter of fact these cases are just frequent enough to prove the statement we have made by their very rarity, and the fact remains that the rank and file of musicians are not paid at all adequately to the service they perform.

As a result of this the credit of the musician as a class is not so good as it should be.

True, this is ofttimes blamed to a certain improvidence which seems to go with the musical temperament and the existence of which we must admit, at least to a certain degree, but even that improvidence is the result of irregular and inadequate payment for work done, and were the profession more definitely and properly commercialized this improvidence would gradually disappear.

And all this grows out of a certain unexplained and almost unexplainable fact that the public, regarding music largely as a gift from heaven, has always, in this country at least, expected it to be furnished for nothing.

Musicians themselves, time out of mind, have fostered the idea, until today a lack of system in the fixing of prices for music work is lamentable indeed.

There are scores of clubs, societies and various other organizations in Chicago, and doubtless also in St. Paul and Minneapolis, and every other large city, which never dream of paying anything for the music they need as entertainment, but depend absolutely upon their ability to coax it from professional musicians and their pupils.

The specious argument is always used that "the advertisement" gained by appearing before a more-or-less influential club will always, later on, lead to "pay engagements."

No fallacy could be greater. The public appreciates only that which it pays for.

Only that which costs time, or blood, or money has any value whatever in the public mind.

A club that has heard a singer for nothing promptly rates that singer at his own valuation, i. e., NOTHING.

"Why," said a club member in my hearing, "that singer came to us for nothing, and now she has the nerve to ask me to buy a ticket for her downtown recital."

Said a very good Chicago artist to me: "I sang for a certain suburban club for nothing last fall, on the definite promise that I would be engaged and paid my price at the 'special spring concert.' My appearance was a successful one. But, this spring, when making up the list for their annual function, I was left off, and one of the committee said, I am told, 'Why should we engage Mrs. S——? We have already heard her.'"

"Serves you right," I replied, "for you should know, without having to learn by bitter experience, that no club will value you any higher than you value yourself. If you are willing to sing, even once, for nothing, that remains your estimated value to that club forever after."

And—not only so—but, no matter how sacred is the promise of secrecy, if you will oblige "just this once," no case has ever been known of a club which, securing a singer for nothing, did not at once tell every other club within a radius of a hundred miles, and the result of EVERY FREE APPEARANCE is, inevitably and inexorably, the offer of a dozen more FREE APPEARANCES. Only that, and nothing more.

"My artist," said a New York manager to me, "was offered a free appearance with a certain influential woman's club of New York, and I was told that if I let her sing there she would be heard by the representatives of thirty-three other important clubs, who would be present."

"'That,' said I, 'constitutes just thirty-three reasons for my decided refusal, for nothing is more certain than that, in some way, the fact of madame singing for nothing will leak out, and the net result of the appearance will be thirty-three offers of other free appearances.'

"'No,' he continued, 'since your club really wishes my singer, you will certainly have to pay the price to get her, and that one check, in hand, will be worth all the prospects and probabilities in the world.'"

A certain influential commercial club in Chicago has a persuasive doctor on its program committee, and although nothing could be more impossible than that he would give his own professional services for nothing, he will yet spend hours each week running about from studio to studio asking teachers, young artists and advanced students to appear before his club, at luncheon, for nothing, on the promise that there "will be influential people present, and that other engagements will be sure to follow. Besides," he always adds naively, "you will have a good time and get a fine lunch for nothing."

And, amateur and professional alike, the singers and players appear week after week, and, all alike, they receive a perfunctory "thank you," and after that they are promptly forgotten, for one of the unwritten but nevertheless steadfast tenets of this club is that they never want the same artist a second time.

And, truth to tell, they do not need to have him, for there is an endless list of those who are more than willing to swallow the bait offered by the wily doctor and to appear before this "distinguished company" of business men for nothing.

Parents with talented children sacrifice greatly to give them education. You, as teachers, provide the adequate drill and repertoire.

Then what?

The young artist comes up against the fact that there is a very small paying public for his work.

There are, as yet, plenty of openings for young teachers, and the church field still offers a passable living to many, but the concert field is pitifully inadequate to the vast number who seek employment therein and who are fitted to do the work.

How to correct all this?

A very difficult problem indeed—but one we must face and seek to solve.

. . . . . .

The first thing to be done—it seems to me, is to absolutely divorce the amateur from the professional and to set a very definite status for both.

More people should study music as a part of general education, and these should never be encouraged in any way to enter the professional field.

And—those who aspire to professionalism should be given an exceedingly high standard of attainment.

And—while striving toward that standard they should not appear professionally at all.

. . . . . .

But—comes the day when the young singer or player ceases to be an amateur—when he is, by every standard of his teacher and the public, an artist.

From that day forward he should appear, absolutely nowhere, for nothing.

For introductory purposes he can establish a sort of salon in his own home and can, periodically, invite those who wish to hear him for the purpose of negotiating engagements.

And he can, and perhaps he must, eventually give a big recital or two for introductory purpose at his own expense and entirely complimentary to his friends, the managers and the press.

The advisability of this course is sometimes questioned, but it is my belief that it is a perfectly logical and legitimate procedure and that even if such a concert costs $500 or $1,000 it is still much better to give it and pay the price than to appear before clubs and societies for nothing as "an introduction."

In the case of your own concert you stand every opportunity to impress those who engage artists—in the case of the free appearance you simply set your status as "nothing."

. . . . . .

The public should be taught that no one should be employed in music work, either as teacher or artist, until fully prepared.

Of course, this brings up the many questions of standardization and, probably, of organization and possibly unionism in music—and, if these questions must be met, let us not delay meeting them, but do our thinking and our acting promptly and bravely.

. . . . . .

And—while the coming professional is on his way he should not appear in public at all.

His teacher should provide plenty of studio and class recital opportunities, and he can, at home—or in the homes of friends—test his wings and air his repertoire.

But—he should not appear in any sort of public function until he is ready to do his work correctly, and then he should demand pay ALWAYS.

There should be no such thing as free public appearances for musicians.

. . . . . .

When a church or a club desires to give a public entertainment everybody understands that the janitor and the florist and the printer must be paid.

The church or the hall must be lighted and warmed, and this, too, must be paid for.

But—in many, many cases, it is expected that the musicians will appear for nothing.

"I give my time and money," said a woman worker in the church, "to get up an entertainment—why, then, should not the professional musicians who belong to this church give their services without payment?"

"Because, my dear madam," is a good reply, "while you are giving only of your surplus—your excess—you are asking the musician to give his very living. Your husband (should he chance to be a florist) will certainly want pay for the palms to decorate the stage—therefore, the musicians should be paid, too."

. . . . . .

The only case in which any musician should give his services without pay is in the event of a well-authenticated charity affair in which the hall, the printing, the ushers, the flowers—in fact, EVERYTHING—is donated outright. Unless the musician who is asked to perform knows this to be an actual fact he should refuse his services also—for, certainly, the least estimate he should place upon himself is that he is worth at least as much as these factors.

Schools and individual teachers too often are ready to let their advanced pupils appear in concerts without pay—"for experience, and to acquire poise and acquaintanceship," forgetting that also, and inevitably, they are setting their status as that of musicians who do not consider themselves worth any pay.

And—while some excuse may be made for advanced students and very young artists, there can be none whatever for those of more mature years and experience, and this class especially should be absolutely unattainable in any other way than through the payment of money.

We love to prate about art and the doing of things for "art's sake," but what, think you, do the really "great artists" do for nothing?

Why does the public wish to hear McCormack or Galli-Curci? Because they are great artists—yes. But also because they are people of publicity and great business success. Because, in a word, they have been commercialized.

The public knows that John McCormack gets several thousand dollars each time he sings and, therefore, every member of the public wishes to add more dollars to that pile.

This brings us, naturally and easily, to the fact that while personality and natural gifts may be great in a given case, and while it may be true that the preparation for a public career has been extensive and effective, it yet remains the fact that PUBLICITY is an equal factor and that, without Publicity, no career is possible.

The public wishes to hear Heifetz just as much because he is the highly advertised Heifetz as because it believes him to be an exceptional artist.

For—given all the foundationals which should insure success, it yet remains true that the artist must place a definite money value on himself, and unless he does that he will fall short of success.

Every individual musician, therefore, as well as every state association and every other sort of organization, should take this subject vitally to heart and should strive in every way to commercialize music to that degree which will make it a successful competitor of every other employment or profession in the world.

Let the school room and the lecture platform be the places in which "art for art's sake" is studied—let the amateur and the dilettanti browse over music to their hearts' content.

But, let the professional musician remember that he lives in a work-a-day world and that in this year of Grace, 1919, PRACTICALITY is the keynote of everything.

Let the professional encourage and preach the doctrine of democratization of music and let him help along that idea as far as his time and his strength will permit.

Let him also remember always that loyalty and patriotism are as much expressed in music as in any other way—more than in most; and that, therefore—Americanization of music is a subject worthy, today—of all attention.

But—let him not forget for a moment that neither of these things will avail to make music the immense factor of the future which we wish it to be and which it ought to be unless we learn also that commercialization of music is a crying need and one to which we must put our undivided attention for the next few years at least.

At Lockport, N. Y., where they have a really wonderful American convention each Fall, I delivered an address on "Commercialization" last September which was received with great interest—not because of its brilliance or wonderful preparation, but simply because the hundreds of young artists there assembled saw in the idea the germ of that prosperity and happiness for musicians which is their birthright and which they ought to demand from the world at large.

In closing that address I gave the audience a slogan which was received with much acclaim and which, I know, was adopted by many at once, and which, I am told, has resulted in improved conditions in many cases.

I leave the same slogan with you as a parting word. It is:

"NOTHING FOR NOTHING."

G. SCHIRMER AND WELFARE WORK

For some time the officers of G. Schirmer, Inc., New York publishers, have been great believers in welfare work, as their restaurant, ball grounds, and bowling alleys testify, but the greatest good they have recently done for their employes is the adoption of a group contract with the Travelers Insurance Company, covering their two hundred employes.

Every person who has been employed six months was insured for $500 on July 1. Employes who have been with the company two years will receive $600. Every two years there is an increase of $100, until at the end of ten years the employe will receive $1,000.

DANIEL MAYER GOES TO EUROPE

Daniel Mayer, the New York concert manager, sailed for England on the S. S. Baltic, on July 12. Mr. Mayer has gone abroad on matters connected with his London office and also to arrange for appearances in London and tours of England by several of the artists who have been appearing under his management on this side. He plans to return late in August, and during his absence his Aeolian Hall offices will be in charge of Edward W. Lowrey.

AN INTERVIEW WITH MAY PETERSON

By BEULAH WHITNEY
(in the Florida Metropolis)

"Golden girl! Now I know why they call her that," was my first thought when May Peterson walked into the parlor of the Windsor Hotel yesterday afternoon, for there is a glow about her just as warm and radiant as the glitter of pure gold. And the blue of her eyes and becoming gown was just that shade one sees through the mist of the farthest cloud from a fading sunset. Surely she was dreaming of purple and blue clouds when her milliner made that big blue hat with the softest folds of purple tulle on its brim.

But the blue of her and the gold of her are not the finest things about Miss Peterson, as I found when she began to talk about everything except what I wanted her to most—herself. It was her sincerity and earnestness. There is not a false note in Miss Peterson's entire make-up.

The most current discussion in the musical world seems to be the nationalization of art. When asked her opinion of this Miss Peterson expressed herself openly and with no fear of being called unpatriotic.

"I do not think that patriotism should enter into it," she said. "A nation's art is a nation's personality, her vent soul, and to take any one country's style away from music lovers would be robbing them of something which is their heritage of art. I do not think it necessary for artists to go abroad to study, for we have so many wonderful facilities in our own land, but I do think that after one begins to know music that a vast amount can be obtained from study abroad. We go over there, not for the thing they teach, but the things they do not teach. The finer things that one can only feel.

"Music of our country cannot be compared with that of another. In German music there is a certain depth, a heaviness, and while there was the same depth in French music, it is so much more subtle and hidden that one can hardly realize it was there. In each there is something to be gained by a true artist.

"I love life and I love people," she said as the conversation reverted to a more personal strain. "Always when I give to them I am getting, Oh so much more in return, though they never know they are giving to me. Sometimes when I am singing I can feel the air around me tingling with suppressed emotion. It is then that I want to go just one step further and give them better than the very best that is in me. Success to me is wonderful, and I'm always wanting to do something bigger and bigger." There was a glint in her eyes that made me feel that she is going to touch the heights of fame.

Miss Peterson is all American, and she has that lovable sense of humor that keeps one in tune with the world. It came to her rescue admirably when she was accused of being engaged to Rodeheaver, Billy Sunday's song leader. "He's nice, and southern, though," confided this girl from Wisconsin, and it wasn't a local parlor kind of confidence, either.

Of course, after this, we had to talk a little about marriage, and she said a lot of things that would have been good advice to young marrieds. One point she made was the necessity of women keeping up with current events. "Haven't you ever noticed how after a dinner the women gather in a group in one end of the dining room and talk about the latest style hair dress or whether Vogue is as good as it was before the war, while the men in the other discuss the peace treaty and Germany's attitude. I'm neutral," she went on. "It's lots of fun hearing the women talk clothes, but it's vitally more entertaining to listen to history in the making, so I put my chair just as near the middle as I can get it and feel like I am at a double-ring circus and very much afraid that I will miss something."

And she looked at me as if she were seeking a sympathetic chord, with that ever-ready humor making the stars in her eyes play hide-and-seek behind long lashes, and I knew then that it was that that had made all of France and America fall down and worship at the feet of the Golden Girl.

THE PRESS AT LARGE

In this division of Music News there will be printed, week by week, comments on various concerts and artists which have appeared in the daily and weekly press of the country. This is done in the belief that this matter will be found to be of great interest to a large number of people. This is in no sense an advertising department, and no items will be accepted for pay

Eleanor Spencer

Some recent press opinions of the work of this brilliant American pianist:

Eleanor Spencer gave a piano recital yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall—her first, if memory serves, in two years. She ought to be heard here more often, for among the many Americans of both sexes now in the public eye she is one of whom we, her countrymen, may well feel proud.

Not only is Miss Spencer an excellent pianist, but a musical personality. The instrument on which she plays with so much skill and assurance is not for her a means of obtaining superficial approval. It is simply her medium of translating into sound the message of the composer.

Never does Miss Spencer lose sight of her noble aim; never does she indulge in vain display. It is refreshing, it is inspiring, to listen to a woman who combines technical accomplishments of so high an order with artistic feelings so pure, so healthy, so sincere.

There is something almost masculine in Miss Spencer's vigorous attack, in her incisive rhythm.—New York American (Max Smith).

Miss Eleanor Spencer is a pianist with a sound method and correct musical appreciation. She construes her music in a manner that shows understanding and technical mastery.

Chopin's Berceuse and a Liszt Tarantella completed an interesting and unusually well played program.—Herald.

When people leave a piano recital saying, regretfully, "But it was an awfully short program," the artist who has just gone down to the green room to receive the congratulations which she only half believes should be in the lobby.

Yesterday afternoon Eleanor Spencer gave a recital in Aeolian Hall. She is a very straightforward young woman, sincere, without a hint of dullness, achieving her effects through a stirring clarity of tone, and something very direct and forceful in her style that makes her playing stimulating. She played the Schumann Sonata in G minor, three poems of Scriabine, besides the invariable Bach and Beethoven, and the Chopin Berceuse. The Crepuscule d'Ete of Rhene-Baton has a delicious rhythm. Miss Spencer could not be persuaded to repeat it, however, showing a modest restraint that is not the most impressive attribute of the average recitalist.—Evening Mail.

A large fund of technic is at Miss Spencer's command and she uses it unaffected, sincerely.—Evening Sun.

A scholarly and interesting recital. . . . Miss Spencer's musicianship is sound.—Evening World.

Miss Spencer plays with a musical touch, good rhythm, clearness, and intelligent comprehension.—Evening Globe.

Herbert Gould at Sea

Herbert Gould, well-known navy song leader, returned to the Great Lakes Training Station this week, after a two weeks' stay with the Atlantic Fleet on board the U. S. S. Mississippi, where the gobs sang such as the blue deep has never witnessed before.

This is the first time in the history of the navy that a song leader has been detailed to a ship, but the remarkable success of Mr. Gould's experiment is no doubt the forerunner of what may become a permanent feature later.

Every night the good natured songster engaged the crew in chorus singing, leading them in new popular airs, with all of which he seemed to have entered into understanding. Of all men singers Gould alone has been able to win the applause and co-operation to the extent of an entire singing ship's company. A big, pleasant lively voice, his chief asset, with his good humor and honest effort to make everyone sing, gained for him the hearty good will of the fourteen hundred men who joined him in a mighty sea-going chorus.

The men grouped themselves in all sorts of out of the way places upon the ship's superstructure and decks, but Gould welded them into one chorus.

Bandmaster C. E. Wallace, formerly of a St. Louis symphony orchestra, co-operated with Gould in staging the scenes and conducted the ship's musicians. Moving pictures of the latest productions, usually of nine reels or more, are shown every night in connection with the entertainment of other character. Boxing, wrestling and minstrels lent variety.

The Mississippi, which had learned to regard Mr. Gould as a member of the ship's company, was greatly disappointed when he was ordered back to Great Lakes to resume his duties there. The best wishes of the entire ship's company go with him, and a welcome will always be ready for him whenever he wishes to return.

Besides his work on the ship, Gould helped out in the local entertainment while the ship was in Norfolk, where service men were in evidence, and made himself generally well known and liked.—From the Mississippi Bulletin (the only newspaper printed at sea).

At a Bohemian Celebration in California

Bohemian music which delighted his countrymen was furnished by the violinist, Joseph H. Chapek, of Chicago Conservatory, who is here on a vacation and has been active in receiving and entertaining the Czecho-Slovak soldiers. He gave them first the Nocturne of Chopin, and a fantasie on Bohemian airs by Slunicko, Mrs. Chapek accompanying him at the piano.

Then, later, he played them a composition of his own, inspired by formation of the Czecho-Slovak republic and rushed to completion when he heard this body of troops would be landed here. It is a march which he has named "Czecho-Slovak Republic" and his playing it for them was its first performance. He has written words for it, but since none had opportunity to learn these and sing, they were read to the audience. The rendition was greeted with great fervor, and Maj. Vladimir Jirsa, commanding the troops, went upon the stage to personally thank the composer. Recalled, Professor Chapek played the Serenade by Drydla, another Bohemian composer.

The program was concluded by the soldiers singing their battle song, "Spejme Dal," which is translated "Forward," and is said to have been devised by the army to which these men belonged while fighting their way through Russia to Siberia, and to have struck terror into the hearts of the Bolsheviki.—San Diego Tribune.

Florence Easton at Ravinia

Florence Easton's Tosca will be new in this neighborhood, as was her Mimi in last night's revival of "La Boheme." As the Ravinia season rolls on the clientele is learning how thorough and all around has been the training of this handsome Englishwoman. In her two seasons with Mr. Campanini her chief employment was in Wagner's operas, so that Auditorium patrons were not provided with the chance to realize that she was the owner of a vast repertoire belonging to the Italian and French schools of opera. Her departures from Wagner under Mr. Campanini were as Nedda in "Pagliacci," the role in which she opened her Ravinia engagement, and as Madame Butterfly, a part in which she is to be heard later in Mr. Eckstein's schedule.—Chicago Tribune.

Christine Langenhan in California

Mme. Christine Langenhan appeared last evening in the Loring Theater, under the auspices of the Junior College extension department.

The splendid singer gave of her best in a varied program of songs which ran the gamut of composition from the classic measures of Haydn and Handel to weird Scandinavian folk tunes and modern French and English songs.

Her voice is big and brilliant and these qualities were used to advantage in an aria from "Gioconda" and in a Tschaikowsky number which she sang in Russian. "Songs My Mother Taught Me," by Dvorak, which she rendered in the original Bohemian, following with an English version of the same song.

French numbers from Victor Straub, Saint-Saens and Massenet were effective and the English and American songs, all chosen with a view to lightening the program, were extremely pleasing.

The singer graciously acceded to the demands of the audience on several occasions and gave encore numbers or repeated a song the people especially liked.—Riverside Daily Press, May 28, 1919.

Ernest Davis

Ernest Davis, the well-known tenor, scored an ovation; so enthusiastically was he received that he was cheered again and again, and was compelled to respond to several encores. There were 18,000 present.—New York American, July 5, 1919.

Ernest Davis sang admirably.—New York Sun, July 5, 1919.

CAVE THOMPSON

Cave Thompson, the celebrated blind pianist of this city, left on July 16 for an extensive lake trip, after which he will settle down for the rest of the summer with his cultured wife and handsome young daughter at his country home in northern Michigan.

Mr. Thompson's strenuous season of teaching and concert work have delayed his getting away one entire month this time. From present indications, the coming season promises to be the busiest one he shall have experienced in his entire career. All communications should be sent to him at Bass Lake, via Maple City, Mich.

A RECORD MAKING PERFORMANCE

By EASTWOOD LANE

It is doubtful if any person, however accustomed to public appearance, ever suffered boredom at the moment of emerging from the semi-darkness of the wings of a theater or concert hall into the concentrated stare of two thousand eyes. Assuming that the poor wretch blinking like a bat out of a barn be a concert pianist. He makes his bow, sensing the while a distinctly Missourian tinge in the atmosphere. Seating himself before the concert grand, he surveys the audience with what is meant to be polite unconcern touched with disdain. He strikes a preliminary chord and encounters more demons to be placated—the two thousand ears located just behind the above mentioned eyes.

A comparatively recent invention gives the pianist a chance for a change of thrills. Hand played rolls for player pianos have attained a tremendous popularity and vie with the phonograph as a disseminator of musical culture throughout the country. One can take Harold Bauer or Rachmaninoff on a six months' cruise or in the wilds of a Canadian hunting lodge, in so far as the best he offers musically is concerned. It is with the actual recording itself that this relation has to do—an experience unique, nay, disconcerting to a pianist accustomed to the presence of auditors.

The writer was recently asked by a prominent player piano concern to record his "Four American Dances."* Now I—this article takes a "first personal" tone throughout—I don't know much about machinery. While I come in daily contact with various devices which transform and transmit energy, the exact modus operandi in any instance has never aroused my curiosity. The fact that I do not know what makes a trolley car go has never given me misgivings. As I sat, en route in the Pullman (composers invariably ride first class) it occurred to me that I was very ignorant on the subject of record making, in a mechanical sense or otherwise. I did not know what made the little round holes in the paper nor why these perforations revolving on a spool make piano music.

As I drew nearer to my destination my imagination constructed a machine considerably like a Hoe printing press. I, in common with many New Yorkers, have often watched these fascinating contraptions through Broadway windows as they rolled out the news of the day. I figured that in making a player piano record the paper slides through between the hammers and something and that every time a key of the piano is struck a pin or nail or something is driven through the paper, making a hole, each hole representing the tone of the key that made it.

Following this intense but obviously lucid bit of cerebration, I deduced that to make the right or correct hole I must hit the right key at about the right time. My inability to always do this has kept many a parlor conversation from being a complete success. I became more and more convinced that nothing short of a miracle could enable me to play a number which would not at once convince the listener that I had plagiarized frightfully from the score of ELEKTRA.

Arriving at ———, I was met at the station by the presiding high priest of the sacrificial rites in which I was to be the victim. Instead of going directly to the player piano plant, I was taken for an auto ride in the country. The fresh air and later a calorious dinner banished my nervousness for the time being, but when I was taken through the factory offices toward the recording room, I had another attack of pelvic nobody-at-home—a combination of mental and gastric apprehensiveness. I entered the room with a firm step, however, and was introduced to a young woman at a desk whose manner was as detached as an electrocutioner's assistant. A glance around the room revealed no machinery—nothing but a concert grand piano.

"Take it easy and smoke a cigaret," said the executioner. I puffed hectically and looked out of the window toward the cold gray hills. I "took it easy" and massaged my fingers—cold, flabby-like attenae with which I was supposed to register with exquisite nuance and color something that in a moment's egotistical madness I had referred to as my piano compositions. I inspected a photograph on the wall—it was Mr. Harold Bauer. I turned thoughtfully away. On the other side of the room was another picture signed Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Near this a beautiful dark-eyed girl looked pensively from a frame and her very kindest regards were signed Tina Lerner. My curiosity waned as to the identity of the remaining photographs. Taking another farewell look at the hills, I asked to be taken to the recording room. "You're in it now," said Mr. Z., indicating the piano with a wave of his hand. I mentally recalled the machine I had visualized on the train. I sat down to the piano after having been told that I could "warm up a bit." Nothing clicked when I pressed the keys, nor could I hear anything which sounded as if it might punch a hole through paper. Mr. Z. went into an adjoining room and then called out to me that I was not to start playing for the record until I heard a bell ring as a signal. I recalled vividly a moment in my sophomore year when, as a contestant in a hundred-yard dash, I heard the words of the starter: "Ready! On your mark! Set!"

The bell rang. I was off. Followed this, phantasmagoria. In front of me a pair of hands romped up and down the keyboard in a detached manner. A moment of consciousness was taken up with a mathematical calculation as to how many measures remained in the composition. Followed another flight of fancy far removed from the realms of the aesthetic. At last the hands stopped cavorting and Mr. Z. entered with what was meant to be a reassuring manner, but which, in this case, scarcely carried conviction. After another smoke, during which my courage was boosted almost to the bragging point which Tom Sawyer attained upon the occasion of his first pipe, I was induced to try again.

I recorded seven numbers in all. Kind friends have told me, however, that they sound "just exactly like me." I understand that they will be sold to people who like music and own player pianos. Mr. H. G. Wells calls a player piano a "gorilla with fingers of equal length and a sort of a soul." Something tells me that atavistic tendencies prevailed during my playing; I doubtless did credit to my arboreal ancestors. I don't know yet what makes the holes in the paper nor why the little holes make music, but I mean to find this out some time.

*These "Four American Dances" of Eastwood Lane's are soon to appear in "Fischer Edition." J. Fischer & Bro., New York.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.

The recent announcement of the Ann Arbor University School of Music of its concert activities indicates that the Choral Union and May Festival Series for next season will be materially elaborated. Six concerts will be given on the pre-festival series, including two appearances of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, which has made so splendid a record since Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished pianist-conductor, became its head. Although Mr. Gabrilowitsch has been heard in Ann Arbor many times as a pianist, he has yet to make his debut as a conductor. It is anticipated that the orchestra under his baton will be received with a great deal of fervor on these occasions. The program for the winter concerts is as follows:

October 18—Geraldine Farrar, assisted by Arthur Hackett, tenor; Rosita Renard, pianist, in song recital.

November 17—Detroit Symphony Orchestra (soloist to be announced).

December 4—Jascha Heifitz, distinguished Russian violinist.

January—Attraction to be announced.

February 10—Josef Hofmann, pianist.

March 8—Detroit Symphony Orchestra (soloist to be announced).

The May Festival, consisting of six concerts, will take place during four days about the middle of May, and, as usual, will employ the united services of orchestra, chorus and a list of the most renowned soloists, both instrumental and vocal. At this time a large children's chorus, which proved so attractive a feature of festivals in the past, will again be assembled for the Friday afternoon concert, the remaining portion of the program being given over to numbers on the big organ by some prominent virtuoso. Saturday afternoon an orchestra will appear in a symphony program in place of the usual organ recital.

Naturally at this early date it is impossible to announce details regarding the festival programs, other than to state that negotiations are pending with artists of wide recognition.

The University School of Music summer session began Monday with the largest summer attendance in its history. It is anticipated that more than 100 students will be enrolled for work in various lines of music. Many of these are professional musicians who have come to Ann Arbor for special coaching.

The following members of the regular school faculty are in charge of the instruction: Theodore Harrison, James Hamilton, singers; Mrs. George B. Rhead, Nell B. Stockwell, pianists; Earl V. Moore, organ and theory; Byrl Fox Bacher and Blanche Raymond, theory; Wilfred Wilson, band instruments.

Other members of the regular faculty will be widely scattered during the summer for recreation and rest, Dr. Stanley going to Maine, S. P. Lockwood and family to the Adirondack Mountains, Grace Konold to Chicago, Edith B. Koon to Colorado, Otto Stahl, New Hampshire, Secretary and Mrs. Sink to Colorado, Nora Hunt to the east, Dorothy Wines to Mackinaw Island, Maude Kleyn to her home in Holland. At the close of the summer session the members of the faculty will take their vacations in different parts of the country.

University Concert

Under the auspices of the Ann Arbor

University School of Music an interesting concert of vocal, cello and organ numbers was given in Hill Auditorium on the evening of July 2, when the first program in the series of weekly concerts, to be given during the summer session, took place.

The program was opened by Earl V. Moore, head of the organ department, who offered Concert Overture (Faulkes), winning the enthusiastic approval of the large audience which had assembled. Later Mr. Moore again appeared, offering Pastorale (Guilmant) and Intermezzo (Widor) in which he again secured an ovation. Mr. Moore ranks as one of the best young organists in the country and has appeared in many cities with great success. His mastery of the great instrument in Hill Auditorium is evidence of his musicianship and the enthusiasm with which his numbers were received indicate that the public enjoys the king of instruments when properly played fully as well as the more spectacular forms of music.

Marion C. Wier appeared in two groups of cello numbers, Variations Symphonique (Boellman), "Arioso" (Handel) and "Dedication" (Popper), in which he made a fine impression. He is an artist of real ability and plays with style and taste. He immediately won the approval of his hearers and at the close of each group was recalled to the platform several times and only refrained from contributing unannounced numbers because of the length of the program.

James Hamilton, tenor, in a group of three numbers, consisting of recitative, "With Overflowing Hearts"; aria, "Soft Southern Breeze" from "Rebekah" (Barnby), Serenade (Lalo), "Because" (D'Hardelot), so delighted his hearers by his clear, ringing tones, perfect enunciation and distinct legato that after insistent demands he was obliged to respond by offering as an encore "Where My Caravan Has Rested," by Lowe. Mr. Hamilton is an artist of first rank. He possesses a beautiful dramatic tenor voice, which he handles in good taste, exhibiting musicianship of highest quality. His stage presence is excellent and he possesses that magnetic ability to win the sympathetic attention of his hearers with his first note.

The program was brought to a close with "Berceuse" (Godard) and "Ave Maria" (Kahn), in which Mr. Hamilton, Wier and Moore joined. It was a fitting number with which to end so interesting and varied a program. Piano accompaniments were ably performed by Mrs. George B. Rhead.

The next concert in the series will take place Wednesday evening, when an interesting program of vocal and instrumental numbers will be offered by Mr. Robert Richard Dieterle, baritone, and Mrs. George B. Rhead, pianist.

New York Concert Ensemble—The New York Concert Ensemble gave a most successful concert at the Auditorium at Camp Merritt this week. The audience of 2,000 soldiers were most enthusiastic from beginning to end of a program of the best in music. In a short speech they were told how concert artists appreciate the fact that they show such interest in good music and that a most pleasant memory of camp work lies in the fact that it is seldom found necessary to play cheap popular music in order to gain the applause of "our boys."

Peterson—May Peterson was the leading attraction in the big concert given to signalize the opening of the new Atlantic City Hotel, the Ambassador. There was a magnificent audience and a splendid entertainment, Miss Peterson being the artistic center of the program.

The Stadium Concerts

On July 1 the soloists were Edna Kellogg, soprano, of the Metropolitan, and Forest Lamont, tenor. The chorus of the Metropolitan, led by William Tyroler, rendered several numbers. The Stadium Symphony Orchestra was conducted by its regular leader, Arnold Volpe.

Winifred Byrd, Pianist

The star soloist of July 2 was the young American pianist, Winifred Byrd. The inadequate acoustics did not mar any of the superb qualities exhibited at her last two Aeolian concerts.

With an admirable technic and a masterful interpretation the Liszt Hungarian Fantasie became a tour de force. Better support could have been procured by Mr. Volpe, who, however, could not seriously mar Miss Byrd's achievements.

Sascha Jacobsen also was a soloist of the event. Several renditions of the orchestra contributed to the evening's entertainment.

May Peterson, Soprano

On July 3 the admirable soprano of the Metropolitan was the high light of the evening. Notwithstanding an inappropriate location for vocalists, the excellent voice of this charming singer carried the audience into high spirits. Pure Mozartian flavor prevailed throughout her superb interpretation of "Voi che sapete," and exquisite and characteristic was her singing of the Gavotte from "Mignon" (Thomas).

Miss Blanche Consolvo was misplaced, for her vocal material is inadequate and her manner of singing much less satisfactory. The duet with May Peterson from "Lakme" was saved by the Metropolitan soprano. But there should have been better orchestral support for such a capable singer as May Peterson.

The orchestra was at its post, led by Arnold Volpe.

The program of our national holiday met with success owing to its patriotic fervor.

Ernest Davis

The popular night enlisted Ernest Davis, tenor; Idele Patterson, soprano; Lillian Eubank, contralto, and Earle Tuckerman, baritone. Mr. Davis was far superior to his colleagues in a rendition of the quartet from "La Boheme." His sonorous and powerful voice was delightful even in such a field as the Stadium. In the "Rigoletto" quartet the young American tenor thrilled the vast audience by a marvelous and impeccable style. Notwithstanding the uncertain beat of the conductor, the quartet of voices satisfied sufficiently to draw warm applause. The balance of the program consisted of orchestral numbers and a solo by Lillian Eubank.

On July 6 Percy Hemus, baritone; Carolyn Baldwin-Cone, pianist, and the Metropolitan Opera Chorus rendered a miscellaneous program, assisted by the Stadium Symphony Orchestra.

On July 7 Samuel Gardner, violinist, was the soloist with the organization.

On July 8 Sue Harvard, soprano, appeared. Henry Weldon was much more at home in "Robert le Diable" (Meyerbeer) than was the soprano in her numbers. He should be heard in one of our opera houses.

On July 9 Emily Gresser, violinist, was practically unheard. Marie Tiffany was also a soloist.

On July 10 the symphony night enlisted only the orchestra as the prime entertainment.

Ernest Davis Reveals Himself at the Stadium

It is not the end of my vacation, but a few days in the country have made me crave for music. Nature and music are twin sisters. On Friday evening, July 11, at the City College Stadium, was heard one of the Lewisohn concerts. It was an ideal evening for music, but it was enjoyed by only a moderate attendance. The musical program was opened by the symphony orchestra. directed by Arnold Volpe, and he deserved the warm applause after his superb conducting of Gounod's "Fantasia" from "Faust." Admirable and effective was the rendition of the Waltz from "Eugene Onegin," by Tschaikovsky. Mr. Volpe showed familiarity with Russian works. His success, and it was deserved, compelled the orchestra to play an encore which consisted of the "Blue Danube" Waltz, by Strauss, and the audience gave approval to the playing of "Phedre" Overture, by Massenet, Ballet Divertissement from "Henry VIII," and "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal," and the Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saens.

Idelle Patterson was adequate in the duo from "Cavalleria." Her voice is of good quality. She sings intelligently, enunciates clearly, but in such renditions as "Cavalleria" her voice is somewhat light. In spite of this her singing was commendable. She was ably supported by Ernest Davis. His record as a singer is enviable. He has appeared at the Stadium for the third time in the short period of two weeks. His real success was the admirable singing of Rudolphe's recital from "La Boheme." The audience demanded an encore, which consisted of the "Lamento" from "Pagliacci." His sonorous and powerful voice filled the vast field, and many tones penetrated into the remotest corner of the City College.

Cecil Arden

The second popular Saturday brought to the patform of the Stadium the popular and the best of the younger contraltos, Cecil Arden. Her selections were not only difficult, but happily chosen. Fine technic was displayed in the "O Mio Fernando," from "La Favorita" (Donizetti). Miss Arden managed the complicated score of the Brindisi, from "Lucrezia Borgia," by the same composer, superbly. Gladys Axman, a new recruit of the Metropolitan, rendered "Voi lo Sapete," from "Cavalleria," and joined Miss Arden in the duo from "Madame Butterfly."

The concert enlisted, as usual, the symphony orchestra conducted by Arnold Volpe.

P. S.

Edna de Lima

The Sunday concert was made more brilliant through the appearance of Edna de Lima, one of the most charming songstresses before the American public. She sang delightfully and charmingly "In Quelle Trine Morbide," from Puccini's "Manon Lescaut." She was applauded warmly by a large audience. Clarence Whitehill was the other soloist. The Metropolitan Chorus, supported by the orchestra, rendered Ballet Music and Chorus from "Carmen." The chorus was directed by William Tyroler.

Daniel Mayer Sails for London

The popular musical manager, Daniel Mayer, sailed for London on July 12, via the White Star Line. With him sailed Madame Celeste, a soprano whom Mr. Mayer booked for fifteen appearances in London and the English provinces. One of the big Chicago attractions for next season is a course of eight concerts which are to be given at the Medinah Temple. Daniel Mayer has engaged, for these concerts, Mischa Levitzki, Maud Powell, Riccardo Stracciari, and others. He will return to New York the end of August.

CHARLES ALBERT STEBBINS

In 1905, quite unobtrusively, there was placed on the market a composition for the organ. It was called a sketch, and some lines on its title page indicated the spirit infused into the notes. The silence of the deep woods was in its elusive initial whispering chords. Then a plaintive melody as of Pan tuning his pipes, followed by echoing, far-off calls. Then the sound of jubilant shouts and dancing feet as a throng of elves and nymphs and fairies troop past, dashing across the sward, embodying the very riot of summer gladness and exuberance in their lissome figures and ringing tones. Their passage is fleet, but the brightness shimmers in a long chord which seeks to retain and lengthen the charm of the visitation. Again silence falls until Pan resumes his reedy song. Then he, too, disappears and the notes fade into the woodland stillnesses.

This is the "In Summer" of Charles A. Stebbins. It was seized upon avidly by organists everywhere and added to all permanent repertoires. And into every teaching studio it went as well. It appears perhaps more often than any one number in a year's chronicle of organ events.

The reason for the popularity of this product of a prophet in his own country is not far to seek. It was the very first example of organ music which was determinedly "different." It was a new voice speaking in a new way and doing it so simply and directly that it made instant appeal to both the learned and the unready. It cut loose from tradition without any quarrel, and gracefully made its own place on its own merits.

What has just been said is not to carry with it any hint that Mr. Stebbins is to be accredited by the bald fact alone that he composed "In Summer." It's a pretty good reason for musical being, but it may be assumed that he would like to be judged by his entire product rather than one item. Mr. Stebbins has not crowded his music on the market. But what has come along in the years has had the same strong marks of exquisite fancy, consummate brevity, swift unfolding and exacting search for the fit mode to express mood. Each work bears its poetic prelude to signify the meaning of the grouped notes. "At Twilight" dates 1910 for copyright. Its swing echoes to the last line of the quatrain "of swaying treetops in the garden of sleep." The gathering shadows fall until a star gleams overhead and sings its song of gratitude. The theme is embellished with flute echoes The more solemn voices of the night intone their threnody. Then ensues the peaceful course of the night. "Oh, the Lilting Springtime" bubbles and dances effervescently. It is dedicated to Samuel Baldwin and its chief motive is formed by the musical letters in Mr. Baldwin's name. A second section has the stuff of which dreams are made in it, drifting off into a pastoral strain until the glee of the season once more asserts itself. "When Dusk Gathers Deep" carries an inscription to Harrison M. Wild. The registration for melody is rich, almost dark, in its inference, with an interlude of retrospect to lighten its repetition in a brighter key. "The Swan" draws its inspiration from the Tennyson poem, laying stress not so much on that agitating quality of sweetness with which we associate a swan's death song as on the effect upon the listener. Almost Debussy-like is its indifference to form and key, and the utterance runs from faint delicacy to the thunder of the full organ. At the very last are the characteristic chords which one has to associate with the composer's first work, so mystical, so fluent, so suggestive of longing, sighing and the search for the unattainable.

From the above comment it is to be deduced that Mr. Stebbins' writings carry poetry and fancy in their voices. In addition they show canny knowledge of what an organ can bring out, while no small merit attaches to the fact that they are well within the powers of a fair player. The better the organist the more effective the result, naturally, but they are lovely in themselves.

But if any idea gains ground that Mr. Stebbins, in himself, is not wholesomely human, it can be dismissed summarily, for his life has been so well mixed up with the hardware business that the poetic flavor keeps well in bounds. When it does come forth, it is sane and healthy. A happy combination is that where music and business join hands. Each helps the other. To meet him is to encounter a quiet gentleman whose graying hair suggests more years than he has and whose snapping black eyes and cool, calm voice have undeniable youth in their color and depth. He has a smooth face, laughing mouth, good square chin, and a lithe but compact figure, knows how to clothe it well, has a firm, hearty handclasp, with slim, sinewy fingers, looks you squarely in the eye and gives you honest measure as he smilingly but serenely sizes you up. If he talks a bit about himself, reluctantly, you learn that he loved music keenly as a boy, studied organ with the man who sets so many on the right path, Harrison Wild, harmony with another choice spirit, Hubbard W. Harris, as well as Adolf Weidig, and played an organ meanwhile. Finally, one day, when he couldn't keep it, he wrote his "Festival Piece" and "In Summer." The success helped him to see that he had something to say and perhaps owed it all round to try and say it. So he sidetracked the hardware business and went to New York to study with Dethier and Percy Goettschius. On arriving he sought Schirmer's music store, found the window filled with a display of "In Summer," and felt so much at home and welcome that he remained in Manhattan ten years, playing in Fourth Science Church happily much of the time.

A few years ago he found that nothing could replace Chicago in his affections, and with business acumen came back to where the musical center is to be. He plays for the First Church of Christ, is associated with the Aeolian Company, and is a new member of the Executive Committee of the A. G. O. and a good, all-around man to know, meet, admire and joy in.

"DO, RE, MI" THEORY EXPLAINED

An Answer

By MARY HOUTS FLAGG

(All rights reserved)

The little girl who has a piano of her own, who takes two lessons a week from a specially trained music teacher, who has a musical atmosphere at home, and a mother to help her with her practicing, is not the person who will need the do, re, mi's. The chord knowledge this child will absorb, consciously or unconsciously, from her hours and hours and hours at the piano and from the study of harmony which accompanies all piano study today will give her an instinctive feeling for intervals, for melodic and harmonic progressions, which will be of inestimable value to her, and which will enable her to become an excellent sight singer without do, re, mi's.

The little girl with a voice like a bird, who "just loves to sing," who will take her song book home every night to study her part of the hard song until she knows it, who has no piano at home, who never took a private music lesson in her life, and never will, but who will sing in the chorus choir of her church, and in some oratorio society, and amateur opera production, if she has learned enough at school to enable her to do it, is the person who needs some basis on which to read music, so that everything she learns to sing will not be learned by rote, or by guessing, but by some actual definite rules.

There is one of the first little girl. There are hundreds of the second.

This is my explanation of the "do, re, mi's."

A girls' glee club which I directed this year, sixteen excellent singers in their early 'teens, singing three part songs, octavo editions of good standard works, met once a week and had the use of a piano. I had made up my mind that I would not ask for any do, re, mi's, but would use that piano and allow them to just sing for the pleasure of it. But, when difficult parts of the songs were reached, parts where the second soprano and alto had difficult intervals, the girls would voluntarily say, "Please let us work that out with the syllables."

Shall we have part singing in the upper grades of the public schools? Shall the thousands of girls and boys in these grades have the experience and the pleasure of singing songs arranged in two, three, and four parts?

No one would deny them this. There are many beautiful songs for unison work, many of the simpler classics which have been composed for solo voices, but which a group of children whose entire musical education will be what they receive in the public schools, can and should sing. But singing even a simple four-phrase hymn or a beautiful old song such as "Stars of the Summer Night," or the well-loved "Sweet and Low," in three or four parts, is an experience which gives great pleasure to those participating, and has an educational value, because it gives harmonic or chord ideas to the children.

Here are fifty children before the teacher. No piano is in the room. The teacher has her pitch pipe, and her voice. She can teach any number of unison songs, quickly and easily, by rote, so that when the class has its turn to go to the room where the piano is the children can have a happy time singing just songs. But girls and boys in the upper grades really want and like to sing part songs. Shall the teacher then take each phrase and teach it by rote, to the sopranos, to the second sopranos, to the altos, and to the two or three big fellows that take particular pride in supplying the bass? The method would be slow, and the work not educational.

Shall the teacher have each section of her "chorus" learn its part singing such a syllable as "loo"? It can be done, provided the teacher teaches the hard intervals by rote. This is not educational, either. There is no mental knowledge of what is being done. There is only a vague "guess-at-it" going on, and what the teacher teaches by rote is parrot work. The result may be that the song is correctly sung, but have the pupils received anything which will enable them to take up the next new song with more ease? They have not.

Two things remain to be done. The subject must be taken up either from the interval standpoint or with the "do, re, mi's."

Are children who have not taken private piano or violin lessons and devoted hours to the practice of music able to grasp the interval idea, and could they, by any possible means, learn all the major and minor, the augmented and diminished, and the perfect intervals which would be necessary for them to know in order to do intelligent note reading? It would be a great waste of time to attempt it.

The "do, re, mi" idea is simple. The children learn the major scale, do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, ti, do, and they learn to place do on any line or in any space of the staff. They then learn two part songs, using these syllables as a means of learning the alto, which in most cases is not melodious, and so cannot be learned so easily as the soprano, and should be thought of as what it is—a second part.

A year later the children learn the chromatic scale, do, di, re, ri, mi, fa, fi, sol, si, la, li, ti, do, ascending, and do, ti, te, la, le, sol, se, fa, mi, me, re, ra, do, descending. They take up two and three part songs, containing chromatics. Now any interval which occurs in their songs may be studied out, and positively and definitely understood. It is the mathematics of their music.

I do not bow down at the shrine of sight singing. And, further, I believe the music supervisors who constantly compare reading music to the study of reading in the grades are making a faulty comparison. Every person should truly know how to read and to read very rapidly, because without reading newspapers, magazines, and books we cannot know what is going on in the world about us and keep abreast of the times. No doubt every one who can read at all, reads ten pages of new material every day, and the scholar and thinker and professional man may read a hundred or two or three or five hundred pages of new material every day. Here is where the supervisor who places sight singing as her goal loses out in her comparison. For, mark you, the most of the material which we read must be new. Is this true in music? It is not. The professional musician, even, just for his own pleasure, will play over and over and over the same dear and well-loved compositions, partly to perfect his own performance of them, but also just for the joy of playing them, or singing them, as the case may be. And as for the every-day person who can sing or play at home, why, for him it is always the same songs and pieces, with perhaps once a week something new. So, to say that children should hop up and sing notes of a new exercise at sight, individual singing, just as they hop up and read a sentence in the reader, because the reading of notes should be as rapid as the reading of words, is making a statement which is based on a false premise. Let them compare the study of music more to the study of literature, for there are some masterpieces of literature which are read over and over, but I doubt very much if they are re-read so often or with so much pleasure as the music is repeated.

So sight singing is not, in my estimation, such an important ability. But note singing, that is the ability to work out the music, to read it definitely and positively, to know that one is singing the correct interval, without going to the piano to play it and make sure, is a very essential thing.

Some great master once said that a singer should not have great knowledge, that it interfered with successful singing. We who are singers do not like the inference, and even if lack of broad musical knowledge would result in better singing, I doubt if many of us would be willing to make the change.

There are, however, singers who sing by rote all their lives, too many of them, and let us not increase the number instead of striving to give all singers some idea of staff notation.

Rote singing seems much easier, at first. It is easier, at first. But, oh, the joy of a splendid class of fifty seventh grade pupils who can take a new four-part song and after a few minutes spent in study of the technique sing it through correctly for themselves! Could they do this if all the years of their intermediate grade work had been spent in singing songs learned by rote?

If teachers in the fourth and fifth grades give a good drill for five minutes each day on reading and singing the pitch names, the scale names, and the solfeggio names of scales, triads on tonic, dominant, and subdominant, and little melodies or phrases selected from songs, and use the solfeggio names for learning the two part songs, then the teachers in the sixth, seventh, and eighth grades can have just such good results, and the children just such joyful experiences!

FLORENCE MACBETH IN MINNESOTA

Miss Macbeth was welcomed by an audience of friends and admirers that taxed the capacity of the Mankato Theater—old and new friends who are so proud of her accomplishments and happy at the opportunity given them to listen to her wonderfully sweet voice. Every seat in the theater was occupied and more were obliged to take seats on the stage.

The program seemed too short for the audience, and so charmed were all that they remained in their seats at the close of the program and eagerly waited for more, calling for encores, which Miss Macbeth graciously responded to.

In her first number, the Polonaise from "Mignon" (Thomas), Miss Macbeth won her audience completely and kept it enthusiastic and clamoring for an encore after each number. This was followed by a varied group of charming songs, perhaps the most successful of which was Handel's "What Is Sweeter Than a New-Blown Rose?" and which brought forth spontaneous applause, which Miss Macbeth responded to with Grant-Schaeffer's "Cuckoo Clock," a delightful bit of song which Miss Macbeth sang charmingly. In Verdi's "Caro nome" from "Rigoletto" Miss Macbeth displayed wonderful control of the vocal technicalities incident to the song and went through the maze of melody in an astonishingly brilliant manner. Responding to the enthusiastic encores, Miss Macbeth sang another group of delightful songs, varying from Vanderpool's "Values," a popular composition on concert programs, to MacFadyen's appealing "If." Her final number was the Bell Song from "Lakme" (Delibes), which she sang with unusual control of her voice and rare sweetness of tone, her voice being at its best at every note, and, as in all her numbers, she gave this number with no apparent effort. Throughout the entire program Miss Macbeth was just her sweet and natural self.

In response to the spontaneous applause and clamoring for more that followed this number, Miss Macbeth sang "Annie Laurie," "Comin' Thro' the Rye" and "The Last Rose of Summer," which she sang so softly and appealingly that there was an interval before the audience completely awoke from the spell of the charm; and when they did their delighted applause brought Miss Macbeth back and she sang the song which always endears her to home audiences and is loved by everyone, especially when sung by her—"Home, Sweet Home."

The late Spring and early Summer months have certainly made up for the interrupted season of music in Denver. Robert Slack's series closed with a wonderfully fine concert by the four grand opera stars, Frances Alda, Carolina Lazzari, Giovanni Martinelli and Giuseppe De Luca. Perhaps this was, generally speaking, the most enjoyable of the entire season and a fitting climax to this series of concerts, to which every music lover of Denver always looks forward each season.

For the first time in the history of the Woman's Club of Denver the music committee of the club was tendered a luncheon in May. A splendid menu was provided, which was concluded with an interesting program. The president, Mrs. Gilbert Weir, spoke on "What Music Means to the Club," and Mrs. Esther S. C. Paddelford gave a talk on "The Influence of the War on Music" and some of the principal songs which sprang from it. Mrs. Stanley Edwards gave a group of Negro dialect readings, and the musical numbers that followed were emblematic of Spring. These were given by Mrs. Mabel Nash Roesch, soprano, with Esther Gumaer as accompanist, and by Mrs. Nona Craig and Mrs. James M. Tracy, pianists. Mrs. Lee Scofield, as toastmistress and chairman of the music committee, deserves much credit for the musical work of the club the past year.

Orville Wasley's pupils' recital was held at Knight-Campbell Hall May 30. Eight bright young people gave a well-arranged program.

Irene Hubbell, pianist, and Mrs. Van Winkle, violinist, gave a program before the Literary Club of Fort Lupton on May 22, with Mrs. H. H. Ewing as hostess, and a week later Miss Hubbell gave her pupils' concert at her studio in Denver.

The program of Song Cycles which Hattie Louise Sims, a prominent vocal teacher, gave with three of her advanced students, Mrs. Richard Osenbaugh, Susan Cleverly and Edward Walters, at the Wolcott School Auditorium on June 11, was largely attended. The program included the "Songs of Love and Spring," by Liza Lehmann; Puccini's "In quelle trine," from "Manon Lescaut"; "Dawn," by Curran; songs from Tennyson's "Maud," with musical settings by Arthur Somerville; lyrics from "Told in the Gate," musical setting by George Chadwick, and a trio called "Memory," by Leslie. Isabel Sprigg accompanied.

Pupils of David D. Abramowitz gave their annual violin recital at El Jebel Temple on June 9, assisted by Hazel Engle and Minna Weinberg, vocalists, and Mrs. Abramowitz, pianist. Mr. Abramowitz is a teacher of the thorough school, and this annual concert is always looked forward to with pleasure and keen expectancy that it is well and artistically prepared.

This teacher also announces the opening of the Abramowitz Violin School on August 1, devoted exclusively to the study of the violin and teaching. The faculty will consist of David D. Abramowitz, head of the department; Lewis H. Cheruoff, Ph. D.; Ruth Filmore Smith, Helen B. Swain, and Henry Houseley, theory, harmony and composition.

The Denver Press Club featured Maud Powell, violinist, and Axel Skjerne, accompanist, in concert at the City Auditorium, assisted by Sonya Mitchell, pianist. Madam Powell made her program doubly interesting by giving a short analysis of her numbers. This always enhances the interest of the listeners as well as making it more educational and intelligent for them. Mr. Skjerne was a sympathetic accompanist. The writer thinks that if Miss Mitchell were free from stage antics and much over-acted mannerisms she would be more attractive to her audience. She is capable of bringing out many nice little embellishments, possesses sufficient technic to make them very effective; she plays with a good deal of fire and vim, but at times pounds unmercifully. She does not play with the free, elastic muscles that the maestro Liszt always advocated so strongly and which the writer has always been imbued with from earliest musical education. Noise produced by striking with the wrists, arms and whole force of the body is not music, and therefore too much of it becomes unbearable.

A. A. Hadley gave his fortieth piano recital with eight of his most talented pupils in McKannon Music Hall on June 14. The participants reflected much credit on their conscientious, painstaking teacher. Quite an innovation was the assistance of the Edison phonograph and Knabe Ampico grand piano, which gave numbers with artists such as Frieda Hempel, Marie Rappold and others of equal note. It was an unusual affair.

The costume recital by pupils of Florence Lamont Abramowitz on June 16, with the assistance of Llewellyn Jones, tenor; Ruth Filmore Smith, violinist; Ruth Childs Troutman, cellist; M. Sorenson, flutist, and violin quartet composed of Misses Ness, Maynard, Miller and Grinspau. A varied program of old classics and extreme modern music was effectively sung by a number of artist pupils, who, together with their pretty and appropriate costumes, created a unique and enjoyable performance.

Mrs. Charles H. Pugh, soprano and director of music in St. Paul's M. E. Church, arranged a concert for the organ fund, with the assistance of Della Hoover, violinist; Mary Joslin, cellist; Georgiana Tiller, pianist; D. G. Angevine, tenor, and Earle A. Johnson, organist, on June 17. From a musical and financial standpoint it proved a great success.

On June 20 Dr. James M. Tracy closed his season of lectures before the Liszt Music Study Club with his 190th lecture, on the subject "The Power of Music Over the Human Mind, Nervous Diseases, Animals, and Insects." A musical program was given by Larne and Eleanor Dodd, Orlean Boldt, Irene Hubbell and Irma Elliott.

On June 19 Paul Clarke Stauffer presented his piano pupil, Alice Sweet, in a diversified program, assisted by Laura P. Chappel, soprano, and on the 21st following he gave his annual students' recital at Knight-Campbell Hall.

At the commencement program in the Central Christian Church, Dr. Lindsay B. Longacre gave an address. A dozen or more pupils of Frederick Schneikher were heard in concert June 30, assisted by D. G. Augerine, tenor, and Everett Foster, baritone. At the annual election of officers of the Musical Society of Denver, the following were chosen: President, Blanche Quigley Matthews; vice president, David D. Abramowitz; recording secretary, Anna Knecht; corresponding secretary, Della Lomason; treasurer, Mrs. James M. Tracy; auditor, Frederick Schweikher; board of directors, Warren Turner, John C. Wilcox, Edward Baxter Rinquest, Mrs. Thomas R. Walker, Mrs. Josephine White.

The Liszt School of Music, Dr. and Mrs. Tracy directors, gave a miscellaneous school concert with a large number of students representing the various grades, assisted by Marie Mauger, vocalist, and Mrs. Tracy, ac-

OSCAR SAENGER GIVES A BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE OF VICTOR MASSE'S OPERA COMIQUE, "THE MARRIAGE OF JEANETTE," WITH HIS OPERA CLASSES, AT THE SELWYN THEATER, AND LAUNCHES TWO ADMIRABLE SINGERS

Two of Mr. Saenger's artist pupils, Melvena Passmore, coloratura soprano, and Richards Hale, baritone, gave a delightful performance of Masse's Opera Comique, "The Marriage of Jeannette," recently. This opera has not been performed for fifty years. It is for two voices only—soprano and baritone—in itself insuring the difficulty of singing it, for each singer must show a comic spirit powerful enough to infuse even the singing. Miss Passmore and Mr. Hale were equal to all the demands made of them and acquitted themselves admirably. A few press criticisms regarding their work on this occasion:

"Miss Passmore has a phenomenal high voice, liquid in effect and under splendid control. Mr. Hale's voice is a beautiful high baritone, muted a shade by nervousness in the early part of the opera, but recovering its purity and exaltation as he forgot it was his debut."—New York Evening Sun.

"The little work is melodious and gave to Richards Hale, who took the part of Jean, an opportunity to display an excellent voice of ample power. In addition he showed an excellent theatric sense and unusual feeling for comedy. Jeannette was sung by Melvena Passmore, whose voice, in its upper register, was of considerable charm."—New York Tribune.

"Two admirable singers appeared as Jeannette and Jean. They were Melvena Passmore and Richards Hale. Miss Passmore carried off her brilliant little songs in excellent style, while Mr. Hale's singing was always graceful and clear."—New York Times.

ITALY'S NATIONAL ORCHESTRA ON MISSION TO AMERICA

For the first time in nearly four hundred years the historic Saint Cecilia Society of Rome will depart from its tradition when the "Augustea"—popularly called the "Saint Cecilia Orchestra"—leaves Rome in October on its momentous mission to America.

Music is generally regarded as the most ephemeral of arts, but is there any institution in the world, artistic or commerical—is there, in fact, anything except a church or a nation that can reckon its existence on a straight, unbroken line from a foundation in 1566? In that year "The Congregation of the Musicians of Rome Under the Invocation of Saint Cecilia," as established by Pope Pius V, its charter being confirmed in 1584 by Gregory XIII. It is the orchestra supported by this venerable institution that is coming to this country for a transcontinental tour next fall.

Compared to the Academy of Saint Cecilia, as it is known today, the Paris Conservatoire, the orchestra of which visited America last winter, is a mere child, having been founded in 1795, more than two centuries later, almost contemporarily with the oldest American musical organization still in existence, the Stoughton (Mass.) Musical Society.

The King of Italy is the honorary president of the Academy, the Count of San Martino, Italy's foremost patron of music, its active president, and the coming of the orchestra to this country, under the auspices of the Italian Government, is an official expression of enduring friendship between the nations.

A committee to welcome and sponsor the visit of the Saint Cecilia Orchestra will shortly be announced by Otto H. Kahn, its chairman. The tour of the sixty most important cities is in charge of Richard G. Herndon, manager, and Frank Taylor Kintzing, associate, who directed the American concerts of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra and the Royal Italian Grenadiers' Band for their respective governments last season.

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

PART III

Voice Building

In the preceding article I have shown that the placement of the voice was merely an important link in the chain of voice culture. Following it comes another link, that of voice building—the means by which we obtain body, quality, color and resonance. Voice building, then, is a continuation of voice placing; a carrying on of the work already begun, bringing it to a higher state of development by adding to our simple exercises and by the constant remembrance and application of the principles of breath control and voice placing which we have already learned.

Let us illustrate again by means of the athlete. He has been shown the exercises by means of which he is to develop the muscles of his arms, legs, back, etc. He has by means of intelligent and patient application of these exercises brought the aforesaid muscles to a healthy state of development. Is he content to stop here? Not at all. These have been but the means to an end. Now he wishes to undertake the more interesting feats of the gymnasium—the bars, the rings, the trapeze.

So it is with our pupil. She has learned how to control her breath, she has learned where to place her tone, and how to keep it supplied with breath, and now she wishes to sing. To do this she must know how to build the "body" into the voice, by means of which she may gain quality and color. It is here that many teachers, many so-called "good teachers," fail in their task. They either entirely neglect this putting of "body" into the voice or else they are content to put it merely into the telling part of the voice—the very high or very low notes.

Body, or breadth of tone, is of such vital importance to a voice that unless it is in every single tone of that voice, from the lowest to the highest, you cannot possibly say that that voice is in a proper state of development. Every note in your voice is just as important as every other note. They are all going to be used constantly once you begin to sing, and it is a great mistake to suppose that a few brilliant high notes or a few sympathetic low ones are going to compensate in the eternal scheme of things for a vast and uncultivated area of voice lying between these delightful extremes. Indeed, were it possible to say that any part of your voice was more important than any other part, I would point to the middle voice, for it is with that voice that the building work is done by which the upper and lower tones are to profit.

This "body" or "breadth," whichever you prefer to call it, which we are to put into the middle voice, and which, once established in that voice, will spread into the upper and lower registers, is a little difficult to describe. We might say that it makes the difference between a tone that lives and one that is dead. It is, however, a case for oral demonstration, if possible. If we can make the pupil hear the difference between a tone that lives, vibrates, has a full, ringing note, and the one which, though correctly placed, remains dead, unvibrant, limited, uninteresting and uncolored, we shall be able to make clear to her at once the result for which we are striving and thus will have taken the first step toward its accomplishment.

For example, take the voices of the two great contraltos, Mmes. Schumann-Heink and Louise Homer—two voices that differ entirely in character but are quite at one on the point of resonance and body. Every note in each of these voices is as equally charged with life and resonance as every other. It may be a loud note, it may be a soft one; it may be colored in one way or in another; but it has body. There are no hollow tones in these voices. Nor is it a question of power. Any voice, however small, may possess body and resonance as well as either of these. I select them as examples because we can all hear them.

If you have a Victrola, take a record of either of these voices, both of which reproduce very truthfully, and note the vibrant yet absolutely steady tone of every note. Then call to your mind some other contralto voice, which has failed to satisfy you, though evidently a good voice. See if, while the lower and upper tones are rich and ringing, there is not in the middle and lower middle voice that hollow, windy quality which many people mistake for power—the note that is placed but not developed. Compare these with the luscious tones of Schumann-Heink and Homer, and you will have an oral illustration of the necessity of something besides the correct placement of the voice.

The same thing applies to the soprano voice. Sometimes it is the middle voice that remains dull and uninteresting, while the high notes are compelling and vibrant; occasionally it is the high voice which is restrained and limited, or, as I have said, placed but not developed. You find no weak spots of this sort in the voices of Nordica, Melba, Farrar or Galli-Curci. I hear you say: "Oh, but these are great artists!" It is not a question of magnificence of voice. I once heard M. Buohy say to a young woman who grumbled because her voice was small: "It is not a question of how big your voice is, mademoiselle, but of what you do with it." Which is true. You may never be able to fill an opera house, but there is no reason why the work that you do in a drawing room should not be artistically and beautifully done.

It is, however, one thing to recognize this so-called breadth in another's voice, and quite a different one to gain it for yourself. We have already made it clear that the work which is to put "body" into the tone must be done, first of all, in the middle part of the voice. The middle voice thus built is not only a model for the upper and lower tones, but serves actually to help in their building. We can use for this work those same simple exercises which we used when placing the voice, using them this time, however, with a different, a fuller intention.

Before, we thought only of getting breath from the right source and supplying it with proper economy to the voice, which we were endeavoring to send out in an arched tone from the masque of the face. Now we must add another thought, that of filling the tone with body, not merely breath, of bringing it forward into the masque of the face, which is a natural resonator against which the tone must be thrown. This resonator acts in the same manner as the sounding board which we sometimes see placed above a pulpit.

Let us then take the exercises—

using, as before, the vowel sounds "O" and "A" as in "father," making the breath feed the tone, and noticing carefully whether we are giving the tone a vibrant, rich quality, rather than the round, hollow tone of the note that is merely placed. It is not enough that your voice should come out of you; it must go somewhere when it is out. It is this breadth or body that gives some voices which are comparatively small a greater carrying power than some others which have a greater volume.

After using these exercises let us go on to a slow scale, taking it at first in the scale of C, using the sound "Aw" as in "talk" for our vowel, putting breadth into the middle voice, keeping the mouth well open, and the tongue lying flatly in the bottom of the mouth—

Continue this slow scale, mounting by half tones until you have reached E flat. Throw the tone outside the face (our imaginary point again) and expand the tone as you go up. Do not misunderstand the term "expand." It does not mean in this case to "spread" the tone, which usually will throw it back into the throat, nor does it mean to let the breath come through it. We use the word "expand" here in the sense of broadening, deepening, filling out, making the ringing, vibrant tone which marks the dramatic voice and which should be absolutely free from either tremolo or throatiness.

An interesting and quite modern example of this dramatic voice is found in Mme. Rosa Raisa, whose firm, ringing high notes are equal to any of the demands of dramatic music and which are perfectly free from any suggestion of either throat tension or vibrato.

For the high voice a good exercise for this expansion of tone is the following short arpeggio:

FIG. 4

We take it still with "Aw," beginning on middle "C" and working up as high as "F," changing to the vowel sound of "O" on the upper tones in order to guard against a too open or spread tone. A soprano may follow this exercise with the long arpeggio taken in the same manner.

It is only by means of breadth and resonance that we are able to put color or character into the tone, and without these we would have no interpretation. In fact, it is because of the lack of these qualities in the middle register that we have so many monotonous voices—so many voices which have color and character in their upper and lower registers, and then are absolutely ineffective in the middle register. A few high notes will no more make a singer than the proverbial swallow a summer, but in a goodly proportion of the voices that go before the public they are evidently expected to.

It is, then, by means of this very beautiful force which we style "breadth" that we obtain the broad, smooth, rich tone absolutely necessary for oratorio, opera, or song singing. Take, for instance, an aria like "Oh, Rest in the Lord." How impossible for any but a full, legato tone to bring out its marvelous beauty! In modern opera we must have dramatic intensity in the full range of the voice. In an opera like "Louise" we have a musical dialogue demanding every shade of tonal coloring, changing with every phrase. How can a singer who relies upon a mere correct placement of the tone in one part of the voice, with a few volcanic notes at either end, hope to handle such material? Even in the delightful art of song singing must we not constantly call upon the bright tone, the sad one, the passionate one, the pure, sweet one—all obtained through having body and resonance in the voice to begin with, using it in the various ways to obtain the various tone colorings?

I suppose there is no more notable exponent of tone color than Mary Garden. The voice of this artist is a mooted question between those who admire and those who do not. Indeed, as one critic aptly put it, during her first season in America: "Wherever any musical two are gathered together it is safe to say that they are discussing the voice of Mary Garden." As an exponent of tone color in operatic work, however, I think that few will deny her supremacy.

Recall this artist in three of her most famous roles; the boy, in "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame," the courtesan in "Thais," and the mysterious maiden in "Pelleas et Melisande." In the first, we hear the thin, pure, sexless voice of the young boy, broadening, ever so slightly, as toward the close of the opera the religious experiences have spiritualized the child, but remaining always the boy—a marvelous accomplishment for a woman. Again, in "Thais," note how the hard, unbeautiful character of the courtesan is voiced in the singing of the earlier part of the score, and how the voice is deepened and beautified by the change of character in the later scenes, while in the desert scene, midway between the extremes of courtesan and saint, the tender womanliness which so moves Athanael appears in the voice. As Melisande, we have the mysterious unearthliness which so befits the strange character of both text and score. This is great acting with the voice, and is something which no earlier singer within my memory has accomplished. Without breadth of voice and resonance these effects could not be called upon at the will of the artist.

A WITMARK SONG

"'Sorter Miss You,' Clay Smith's plaintive little song," says the Witmark & Sons Company, "seems to bob up at most unexpected times. Within a week over thirty programs have come in on which this was featured, and almost everyone who has sung it mentioned that they had to repeat it. Programs have come from as far west as San Francisco and even from the far East, for there was one program from Shanghai, where it was given at the American Mission at a little entertainment and was greatly enjoyed by the mixed Chinese and English speaking audiences. When a song has as wide an appeal as this, surely there must be something exceptional about it."

Vol. 11 Chicago, July 25, 1919 No. 30

PASSING COMMENT

The Musical Times of London, England, celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary (it was established in 1844) on June 1 by printing a special edition and the sending out as supplement of an exact reproduction of its Volume 1, No. 1.

This latter is particularly interesting, and it goes to prove that the "problems" of the music life of today are very much those of seventy-five years ago.

The Times announces in its first issue that it will be devoted largely to the subject of Class Singing of various sorts, and its leading editorial proves that the "Community Singing" idea now so prevalent in America is by no means a new thing.

Also there is an account in this issue of a concert given by the York Choral Society which never came to an orderly conclusion because of the fact that after the singing of Handel's "Sweet Bird" there was such uproarious applause that the following numbers could not be given, and the management held fast to its printed rule of "no encores" and would not allow the repetition of the "Sweet Bird" even though thereby the concert was broken up.

This item is also somewhat startling in view of the fact that most of us had imagined that the "no encore" rule was something quite new, and some of us, in fact, thought that it was really invented a few years ago by Wessels and Voegeli in special application to the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

A third very interesting item in the old issue of the Times is a little notice about Mendelssohn, who at the time of publication of the paper was a guest in London and had just created a furore with his conducting of some of his own works at the Philharmonic concerts.

The advance program of the meeting of the N. A. O. at Pittsburgh is very interesting.

The dates are August 5, 6, 7 and 8, and the place is Carnegie Institute.

There will be a long list of interesting papers and discussions and organ recitals by Charles Heinroth, Edwin Arthur Kraft, Uselma Clark Smith, Hugo Goodwin and many others.

Charles Heinroth, Pittsburgh, is chairman of the General Committee, and if you do not wish to write to him you can find out anything you want by calling up Dr. Francis Hemington, Oak Park.

Considerable dissatisfaction was expressed at Peterborough over the conditions of the students' contests.

On the one hand, those who were listeners only complained that the concert was far too long, inasmuch as it lasted from 8 o'clock until considerably after midnight; and on the other hand, the participants objected to the time limits set upon them and declared that, having prepared numbers which were suggested by the committee, it was unfair to deprive them of playing these numbers through the fact of too limited time for each contestant.

"The greatest dreams demand the greatest work to realize their fulfillment."

—MAX

Of course each contestant in such a case would be inclined to want more time than he would be justified in having; that goes almost without saying. But, nevertheless, he should have ample time to really demonstrate his varied abilities, and particularly should he be allowed to present those things which he had been led to specifically prepare for the occasion.

But the real difficulty lies—most attendants at Peterborough think—in the fact that too much was attempted at one hearing.

It is suggested by all, and strongly urged by those who have the matter really at heart, that there be three concerts at the next biennial instead of one only, and that the singers appear at one, the pianists at another, and the violinists at still a third.

Of course everybody recognizes the fact of time limitation at such a stupendous convention as that at Peterborough, and yet, if the young American artists are to be given an absolutely fair chance, there must be time enough allotted their contests to make them perfectly fair.

In an article printed in another column of this issue of Music News, Henry B. Roney, a long-time teacher in Chicago and one who has been responsible for a vast amount of good concert work in churches and out, goes over some of the phases of the "Nothing for Nothing" propaganda which have already received attention in Music News, and he also brings up some new sides to the question.

In so far as his examples refer to the impositions of the public upon professional musicians, they are merely on a par with the experiences of every other teacher and artist.

Music News, while sympathizing with the losses both of time and of money and also with the wreck of idealistic ideas, is yet firmly of the opinion that all these losses have come about through the ignoring of a straight business principle.

This principle has been so often brought to attention in these columns that it scarcely seems necessary to say again that the attitude of the public in regard to music is always and inevitably a reflection of the attitude of the artist and the teacher.

If the latter hold themselves so cheaply as to even consider free appearances (excepting, as Mr. Roney so convincingly argues, for real charities), then they must expect that the public will hold them at the same valuation.

If a singer admits for one moment that he is worth nothing by singing for that sum, the public ever afterward holds him to his own valuation.

In the case of the teacher being "fooled" by the supposedly impecunious but "ambitious and talented student," we have, as said above, a new phase of the question and one which is more difficult to deal with.

But, after all, the teacher as well as the concert artist should hold himself too much worth while to ever even consider such a proposition as that he should teach for "nothing."

True, there is occasionally a talented pupil who needs to be helped, and once in a while this results in something so fine as to have been well worth while. But such cases are very rare and they should be taken up by teachers so infrequently that the idea that every fairly talented (and very cheeky) pupil may find "free" or "partial" scholarships merely by the persistent seeking shall become a thing of the past.

The cost of living today is so great—modern life has become, indeed, so complex—that, would the teachers survive at all, they must get adequate pay for each hour spent in the classroom.

And, after all is said and done, it would be just as well (if not better) if a lot of aspirants without money should find it so impossible to get free instruction that they would turn naturally and profitably (to all concerned) to other vocations in which, in many cases, they would be more successful in the long run.

LETTERS TO MR. VANDERPOOL

The following letter, indicative of the tenor of scores of others sent him, is one received by Frederick Vanderpool in reference to his popular song, "Values."

From Russell J. England, 256 Cresmont terrace, Collingswood, N. J.:

June 23, 1919.

It is just these pleasant little songs that not only the singer needs, but the audience likes. In other words, I can only call it a big little song and one that will help any singer to put his program over the top. I have also used it several times as an encore and must admit that on more than one occasion the encore received the most applause.

Among others who have used "Values" and have written Mr. Vanderpool glowing letters of appreciation are: Helen Van Luven, Naponee, Canada; Matie Bowen-Fultoni, New York; Laurie Morrill, New York; Thomas Askin, Los Angeles; Helen Feldes, Chicago; C. O. Dierelf, Learock, Pa.; Willard Flint, Boston; Charles B. Stevens, Boston; Mrs. Avery, Vancouver; William Saal, Cleveland; Stella Fryer, Denver, Colo.; Clarissa Dvier, Chicago; Isabella V. Stafford, Fair Haven, Vt.; Eva Hemingway, Grand Rapids, Mich.; Mrs. R. W. Dunn, Butte, Mont.; Dudley Buck, New York; Margaret Abbott, Waterville, Me.; Clara Edmunds Hemingway, Gary, Ind.; Robert Quait, Chicago; Jeannette Hoffman, New Cumberland, Pa.; John B. Siefort, Pittsburgh; Helen Weiller, Brooklyn; Natja Niessen-Stone, New York; Ernest L. Cook, Portsmouth, N. H.; Arthur Lawrason, New York, and Rachel S. Bovier, Denver.

Mrs. Charlotte Demuth Williams

VIOLINIST

A FRAGMENT OF PERSONAL HISTORY

Mrs. Williams' musical career, from childhood to mature womanhood, has been consistent with the advantages of early precocity and careful training. But few artists are in like degree thorough musicians. Finished virtuosity has often been lacking in inherent musicianship. The mere virtuoso delights in Ernst and Paganini; the musician in Beethoven and Brahms. As marked differentiation as is easily recognized between the composition of Brahms and Vieuxtemps, or Bruch and Leonard, is also as easily recognized as between the players Joachim and Wilhelmj and the purveyors of the erstwhile pyrotechnical school of virtuosity.

Mrs. Demuth Williams' exemplars must needs be, by reason of her musicianship and her early and constant training, the scholarly and serious exponents of the classical school. She was eminently fitted for tutelage under Henri Marteau, upon whose shoulders the mantle of the great Joachim has descended.

Beginning her study at the piano at the early age of five, she was conscious of doing nothing unusual in playing, when but seven years old, the two-voiced Bach inventions, each in a number of different keys, and later Heller, Cramer and other studies in keys other than those in which they are written.

Although she did not take seriously to the violin until she was ten years of age, she had played up to this time first violin in advanced duos by Jansa, Mazas and Alard. When she was fifteen years old she went with the Oberlin College Glee Club on its midwinter vacation tour as violin soloist, playing such compositions as the Vieuxtemps Ballade and Polonaise, the Adagio from the Bruch G Minor Concerto, numbers from the Ries Suite in G, and other numbers found on the programs of mature artists. When she was sixteen she was sent to Leipzig, and for three years was a pupil of Hans Sitt in violin and of Johannes Weidenbach in piano, graduating with first honors in both instruments—an accomplishment which has been reached in the history of the Royal Conservatory by but very few pupils. At her violin Prufung she played the Vieuxtemps D Minor Concerto, and at her piano Prufung the Beethoven G Major Concerto, both with orchestra. After six months spent at her home, during which time she gave a number of recitals, she returned to Europe and graduated with first honors from the virtuosity class of Henri Marteau, in the conservatory of music in Geneva. After again returning to America she had the distinction conferred upon her of an honorary diploma from the Oberlin Conservatory of Music, and later the degree of Master of Music.

On her arrival at Leipzig she planned to omit the course in the Theory of Music, which would enable her to devote more time to violin and piano. The request of a sixteen-year-old girl to be excused from the classes in Theory on the ground of having finished this study was evidently an unusual one, even in the Royal Conservatory, where pupils are received from all parts of the world. The other members of the class were apparently as much interested in the case of "bluff" before them as the professor himself. As the request was made in perfect sincerity, and with not the slightest idea that it was unusual, the titter of the class and the severe aspect of the professor caused the applicant's lips to quiver.

"So you have finished harmony?"

"Yes, sir."

"And counterpoint, too, I suppose?"—with a sneer.

"Yes, sir." This was carrying the "bluff" a little too far, and the professor demanded to know if she had also written fugue.

She had.

"And in how many voices?"

At this point the class could no longer confine itself to a titter; there was unrestrained mirth. The incredulity of everyone about her, except the young woman's grandmother, who, not knowing the first thing about harmony, counterpoint and fugue, was almost convinced, with the rest, that there was a mistake somewhere, all but unnerved the "bluffer." The applicant stated, however, as clearly as the "tears in her voice" would permit, that she couldn't remember exactly.

"And how long ago did you finish fugue—twenty years ago?"

This was the climax. The class roared and the young woman burst into tears. The professor walked to the blackboard and wrote a subject.

"Now, little miss, let us see you develop that," giving the plaits of hair hanging down her back a pull by way of emphasis. When the work was done, and not an error could be found, he surveyed his victim from head to foot and said: "Well, I think you have had it," and she was excused; which was quite a saving of time to devote to her fiddle.

Although Mrs. Williams, since her marriage, has not been exploited in the columns of the prominent advertising mediums of the profession, she has nevertheless been recognized by many of our country's prominent musicians as an artist of sterling qualities. After once having played with the Thomas Orchestra, under Mr. Stock, she was later in the season requested to again play with the orchestra, when the usual rehearsal was omitted—so favorably was Mr. Stock impressed with her unswerving rhythm and her sanity in interpretation. In her appearances with the New York Symphony Orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and several times with the Thomas Orchestra, she has each time demonstrated her keen sense of the unity of the composer's work—an infallible proof of true musicianship.

LESTER HUGO CASTLE

Mr. Castle, the popular bass-baritone, has been soloist at the Ninth Church of Christ, Scientist, the past two Sundays. The first Sunday, July 13, he sang "Arise, Shine, for Thy Light Is Come" (MacDermid); July 20, "In Thee, O Lord, Do I Put My Trust" (Frey).

Mr. Castle is continuously in demand as an artistic singer.

MINNIE FLORENCE SANDERSON IS PRESENTED IN SONG RECITAL AT THE MAC BURNEY STUDIOS

A resumption of the Summer Song Recitals at the MacBurney Studios on Monday night brought to attention Minnie Florence Sanderson, scheduled as contralto, but with a voice covering a very long range and especially tending to the dramatic soprano in effect.

Miss Sanderson, a very charming personality, has many friends evidently, and she drew one of the finest audiences yet noted in the Barnum Recital Hall, which was the locale of the concert.

She was greeted most cordially and endorsed enthusiastically. Many flowers were presented to her, and one armful of roses, especially appreciated, came from her sisters of the Sorority Phi Beta.

Mr. MacBurney, true to form, had chosen for Miss Sanderson a program of wide reach, much significance and distinct novelty.

Opening with "Si tu M' Ami" (Pergolesi), "Affanni del Pensier" and "Come and Trip It" (Handel), she showed facility in these cool, collected and altogether suave classic numbers.

The last of the three is the original text, in which occurs the phrase, "the light, fantastic toe," and Miss Sanderson very deftly and neatly conserved, in her interpretation, the terpsichorean and light-hearted suggestion of this text.

"Voce di Donna," from "La Gioconda" (Ponchielli), next engaged Miss Sanderson's attention, and in this there was breadth of interpretative outline and brilliance of tone which marked the singer to be the possessor of dramatic impulse, as well as the vocal means to express it.

The "Arabian Melody" (Borodine) proved to be both novel and equally intense. It is a song of sadness and is very beautiful, as disclosed by Miss Sanderson.

"The Four Maries," a Scottish folk song, was still more novel and also it was increasingly tragic.

It tells of the last hours of a man condemned to death by hanging, and in its flavor it is bitter indeed.

To sing such a song convincingly is a feat, and Miss Sanderson certainly sang it convincingly.

In "Frog Went a-Courtin'," a Kentucky mountain song, Miss Sanderson was both glib and humorous, and in a final group, devoted to Loughborough, Kaun, di Nogero, La Forge and Gilbert, she showed much versatility and an equal amount of musicianship and vocal charm.

The accompaniments were, as always, when Harold B. Simonds plays, artistic and full of the proper feeling. Mr. Simonds knows exactly how to support his singer.

Mr. and Mrs. Lester will be at home in Casper, Wyo., after October 1.

"NO PAID SINNERS"

Dr. McIntyre, lecturing at the Moody Bible Institute, tells the future church workers who constitute his classes that precentors, quartet choirs and the like are not satisfactory and not the ideal source of church music from the standpoint of church welfare. Service is the great idea in any church, and the service idea can be instilled into every chorus choir. Nobody but the organist and director should receive payment, for church music is not entertainment—it is worship.

There are those who will vary with Dr. McIntyre. Nevertheless, he has authority to speak, being the well-known organist from the largest Presbyterian church of Oklahoma City, where the chorus choir has attracted great attention for its superb quality and strength.

CHICAGO PIANO COLLEGE

Very clear piano playing was that offered by Hildur M. Bergstrom at the Chicago Piano College last Tuesday evening, and likewise very exact and musical.

Miss Bergstrom has absolute control of her resources and as her technical development is good and her sense of musical proportions definite, her work at this time proved to be a keen delight to the audience.

She began with the very definite Sonata in B Flat Minor, by Arne Oldberg, which she played with good understanding, and this was followed up with a group of unusual material, and just as charming as unusual.

The first number was the Rubinstein Barcarolle, long used for concert purposes, but played very seldom by students, the "Butterflies," by Ole Olsen, one of the most charming novelties heard in many months (and, incidentally, played better than any other one number on the program); Grunfeld's exceedingly characteristic "Serenade Orientale," and a Mazurka by Felix Borowski.

The "Andante Spianato and Polonaise" (Chopin) was a piece of clear-cut work of which Miss Bergstrom and her teacher may both be proud, and the program ended with a brilliant reading of the "Spanish Rhapsody" (Liszt-Busoni), in which Miss Bergstrom was assisted at the second piano by her teacher, Harmon H. Watt.

Vocal numbers were offered by Mabel Hildebrecht, a student with George Kortzenborn, whose accompanist was Elizabeth Dornbusch.

Miss Hildebrecht has nice presence, rich vocal quality and considerable advancement in her work. C. E. W.

MME. MARIE YUNG

Pupils of Mme. Marie Yung gave a very interesting program last Tuesday evening at Fort Sheridan for returned soldiers. The boys proved a very enthusiastic audience and requested another performance in the near future. Those taking part were Nonie McKay, Wanda Nestman, Elizabeth Fellegi, Charline O'Shaughnessy, Eileen Lee, Florence McNally, Arline Felch, Frances Buth, Charlotte Stevens, Grayce Blair, Evelyn Atkeisson, Constance Penney, John Petri, Myrtle Ostrowski and Dorothy Gnaedinger.

A very successful program was also staged at the Municipal Pier last Friday evening by pupils of Mme. Yung, under the auspices of the Drama League. The auditorium was filled to overflowing with a very appreciative audience.

Kelley—A rousing new Patriotic Chorus is "America's Creed," by Edgar Stillman Kelley, which has just been put on the market in octavo form. Mr. Kelley, one of the most distinguished of American composers, has in this song reached a fine plane of artistic and patriotic musicianship, and the sentiment of the piece, as well as its musical values, are such as will, unquestionably make it very popular.

AT ORCHESTRA HALL

At Orchestra Hall last week the excellence of the bucolic play, "Louisiana," in which Vivian Martin is the star, was emphasized emphatically through the skill and the finish of the organ accompaniments provided by Mildred Fitzpatrick, who very evidently had made a particularly careful study of the picture and its possibilities, and in her playing brought these into especial relief through the use of the exactly appropriate music.

There was, in addition, a very funny farce and also a most interesting travel picture, as well as good orchestral numbers.

The special music number of the week was the Misses Gladys and Roma Swarthout in vocal duets, and the beauty and charm of their work has never been surpassed in any of the Orchestra Hall bills.

They sang "The Passage Bird's Farewell" (Hildach) very beautifully, and in the Barcarolle by Chaminade not only emphasized the excellence of that number, but proved, and very conclusively, their own skill, artistry and originality of purpose.

The voices blend beautifully, there is great charm in the tonal quality and a distinct musical value in each number they present, and all these things were particularly and charmingly accented in the use of Lieurence's "By the Waters of Minnetonka," which in duet form is even more remarkable in effect than in the very much used solo score. HAROLD HENRY

AMERICAN PIANIST

When Harold Henry, a few weeks ago, at the eleventh biennial convention of the National Federation of Musical Clubs, in Peterborough, N. H., aroused by his superb playing of the MacDowell D Minor Concerto, an American audience of unusual dignity, culture and musical discrimination to such a pitch of enthusiasm that it cast aside all restraint and applauded and cheered him for upwards of ten minues, he proved that we do not need to go abroad for great artists, and that we can appreciate one of our own—if he is good enough. Of the quality of Mr. Henry's art there is no question.

We who have heard Mr. Henry several times each season for the past several seasons knew full well that this success would come to him at Peterborough, for it is but the logical climax of his experience and his growth.

He has held himself, always, to the finest sort of environment and repertoire. He has been indefatigable in his efforts to reach the top, and he has steadily and consistently grown in the regard of the general public as well as of the profession itself.

. . . . . .

Harold Henry's career is one that should prove of interest to our ambitious and gifted young students. When little more than a boy—he was seventeen years old—he left his home in the small western college town in which, up to that time, the greater part of his life has been spent, and went to Berlin to continue his studies. The contrast was great. He had to learn to master a new language and to understand—to him—the strange habits of a new people. Naturally of a sensitive disposition, the methods of the first great teacher with whom he studied, who was more interested in this own methods than in the needs of his pupil, retarded his artistic growth. After six very unhappy months—months that might have ruined the career of a less determined individual—he was more fortunate than many have been. He found, in the person of the late Dr. Ernst Jedlitzka, a great teacher who recognized his gifts and his needs, and stimulated the former, while he supplied the latter. Upon the death of Jedlitzka, Henry worked with several widely heralded masters, but, when he came to the end of his funds, after four years, he realized that he was a repository of many conflicting theories and the possessor of only the same gifts and the same limitations that he had when he started on his knowledge-seeking pilgrimage. Upon his return to this country, Henry was faced by the problem of earning a living. He had neither money, influential friends nor the gift of self-advertisement; but he had a great talent, pluck, youth, a vigorous mind, a healthy body and a singleness of purpose—to succeed. He could not launch himself sensationally upon the concert career, so he took to teaching—and, in teaching others, he taught himself. In learning how to remedy the defects in others he learned how to correct his own, and in this way the Harold Henry of today—the great pianist—is actually the product of his own teaching. As soon as he was financially in a position to do so, he took up his concert work. Public concertizing requires publicity, and publicity requires money, and he had to earn this before he could spend it, because he was an American and believed in fulfilling any obligations for which he contracted, and it was not long before his name began to stand for all that was best and most progressive in the art of piano playing. In these years Mr. Henry has placed his work and its demands before everything else. Possessed of the highest ideals, he has been his own most severe critic—has set himself ever-increasingly difficult tasks. He has had no time to wonder why or how others have succeeded. He has known that for himself success could be secured only through conscientious, hard and steady work, and he has been content to win it in that way.

Harold Henry has long ago conquered the art that covers art. His technic is so finished a mechanism that one gives no thought to it.

. . . . . .

And so we read of his new success at Peterborough, two weeks ago, with no surprise.

We knew that he could triumph there—in that specially fine and sympathetic atmosphere—because he had done it before, and we felt certain that even with the fact of the presence of an almost unlimited number of artists and celebrities of various sorts he would yet be one of the chief centers of attraction.

And so it proved, for his playing of the D Minor Concerto of MacDowell again showed him to be a superb artist, and this time there was the added circumstance of a magnificently fine and diversified audience.

That Mr. Henry could triumph before this remarkable body as he did—that he could be listed in every mind as one of the very high lights of the Federation Meeting—proves once more, and very emphatically, the fact that he stands today at the heights of pianism and easily among the best liked and most popular of American musicians.

MAXIMILIAN PILZER

Maximilian Pilzer, one of America's best violinists, is at present in the country practicing and enjoying a beneficial rest. Mr. Pilzer is expected to appear in numerous concerts next season. He is an accomplished musician, and the season of 1919-20 will be rendered more brilliant thru his masterful handling of the bow.

WESTERN CONSERVATORY

Grace Knowlton Scott presented the array of little piano pupils listed below in an enjoyable recital in Kimball Hall on Tuesday, July 15. To praise them all is the desire of Music News, and the praise is none the less sincere because general. All are being ushered into the right channels of musical learning, and, if they will take good care to develop their minds in every possible direction, the next few years ought to make good musicians out of every one of them.

The selections used were chosen with discretion, as far as suitability went, and yet every "primary and intermediate" recital serves to point out the dearth of really good instrumental music for students not yet capable of Godard, for instance, or Moszkowski. For the simple yet richly conceived pieces of which Edward MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose" is the classic example, let us say, teachers hunt far and wide and long for a great composer who will meet this need, for only a great one can meet it.

The popular pianist, Rudolph Reuter, is in the midst of a summer season of teaching of unusual activity. At the Chicago Musical College students have gathered together from Wyoming to Mississippi to study with him. His activity will not altogether cease during the month of August, for he has been engaged to play with the Stadium Symphony Orchestra in New York City during the week of August 17, and on August 30 gives a joint recital with Nevada Van der Veer at Nyack, N. Y. Last Monday he gave a recital of unusual brilliance at the University of Notre Dame, Ind. Early in the fall Mr. Reuter is booked for recitals in Springfield, Ill., and Lindsborg, Kan.

SATURDAY MORNING RECITALS AT CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE

There is a host of music students from everywhere in America, literally speaking, right here in Chicago this summer. It has probably never been equaled at any time in the past. Local celebrities from California schools, Texas towns and Canadian churches are this year sitting at the feet of Chicago instructors and sparring for places on the student recital programs.

On last Saturday, at the Chicago Musical College, Burton Thatcher presented a Miss Blanche Harvey, who sang "Dawn" with particularly nice continuity and with commendable tenderness in the first bars of the song. Winona Lightcap sang the rapid Veracini "Pastorale" in an engaging way. What an opportunity to study a song like that with Herbert Witherspoon! And Miss Lightcap had brought her best to that opportunity.

Leon Sametini presented two artist violin pupils who apparently carried the audience quite away by their remarkable bowing, for the applause was long and loud.

Some modern writers were heard in the piano music, namely d'Albert, Borodin, Grainger and Debussy. The performers were Gertrude Mandelstamm, whose artistry was most evinced in her splendid relaxation; Katherine Gorin, who made a very pretty picture at the piano and played commendably, and Mabel Babbington, a brilliant young pianist with personality. The former student is with Alexander Raab, the latter two with Percy Grainger.

Grace Johnson Konold was enjoyed in "Caro Nome," which she has perfected under Oscar Saenger. The young artist and teacher, Miss Marguerite Kelpsch, who studies with Rudolph Reuter, played a Chopin Polonaise in true Chopin style, indicative of advanced attainments.

EFFA ELLIS PERFIELD

An Appreciation

"Some people say that melodies must be evolved this way," said Mrs. Perfield in her Demonstration of Method last Monday morning, "but I don't believe that is so—nay, more—I will say that isn't so."

And right in that "isn't" lies the keynote of the Perfield personality.

Positiveness and an unafraid spirit! Mrs. Perfield is an original thinker and she is not the least bit afraid to tell the world what she believes to be true.

Not that she is at all dictatorial in her teaching, for, as a matter of fact, whenever she "demonstrates" or lectures she invites dissension and discussion, and she listens most carefully and patiently to all objections and to every idea that opposes her own.

But she always has an answering argument and this argument is backed up, invariably, with logic.

"I do not expect you to see this all at once," she said in elucidating one of her points, "for it has taken me twenty years to work it out, and that is the only kind of conviction that is worth while, i. e., the kind that has years of research back of it."

. . . . . .

The occasion was a class lesson on public school music, which was given at the Perfield School in the McClurg Building, and the cozy recitation room was filled with a throng of eager teachers, who had been attracted by the fame of the Perfield manner, as well as the claims of the Perfield matter.

. . . . . .

Two weeks ago Music News asked permission to print a certain article which had come to the notice of the Editor, this being entitled, "The Do, Re, Mi Theory Exploded," written by Mrs. Perfield.

So great was the excitement produced by this item that the particular issue of Music News was promptly sold out, and today, by request of many who wish to send copies to pedagogical friends, the article is reproduced in our columns.

And in the issue of last week there were two "answers" to Mrs. Perfield, for, as a matter of course, there are scores of people who disagree with her theories.

And therefore, on last Monday, it was doubly interesting to see and to hear Mrs. Perfield explain her position and to make her positive, revolutionary statements.

. . . . . .

She is eager, enthusiastic, alert and logical.

She writes on the blackboard with incredible rapidity and goes from that vantage to the piano keyboard with such speed that she seems, almost, to be in both places at once.

She sings the idea she wishes to convey—she illustrates with every sort of story and gesture—she builds up her arguments step by step, and drives them home with irresistible force.

. . . . . .

It is not possible to give any sort of analytical analysis of what she said last Monday morning, and anyway one must see and hear her personally to get the full benefit of her vitality and her charm, but a few items have stayed in memory in language definite enough for repetition, and these are here given merely as indices of what Mrs. Perfield said in her sixty-minute talk.

EFFA ELLIS PERFIELD

Everyone knows that Mrs. Perfield's pedagogy is built upon the formula, "Feeling, Reasoning, Drills," but not everyone can apply these in proper order.

"Some one told me recently," said Mrs. Perfield, "that drills are for the purpose of putting deeply into the consciousness of the pupil the facts of feeling and reasoning. I say, on the contrary, that drills are merely a test as to whether the teacher has properly presented feeling and reasoning, for if the pupil is taught to feel music first, then to develop it through reasoning processes, he will get all the drills he needs intuitively."

"In the very first lessons the pupil must learn to sing, spell, play and write music," she says. "Things must be done in a large way—no limit must be put upon development."

"If a principle is correctly presented," she continued, "the pupil must then be allowed to develop it in his own way, and there must be no brake whatever placed upon his growth or his individuality."

. . . . . .

"That the do, re, mi system is cumbersome is well known, and that it is antiquated is proven by the fact that the most modern music cannot be read at all with this system," she insisted.

"When harmonies grow so independent and so altogether astray from all the old Richter rules, as do many of the modern pieces, the naive do, re, mi becomes lost in the scuffle, but a knowledge of music built upon chords (not on the scale, she insists) is as elastic as the most infinite possibilities of music writing, and a pupil who has musical feeling and reasoning (and has had sufficient drill) can follow even the most erratic composer wherever his caprice may take him."

. . . . . .

And—you may believe Mrs. Perfield or not—you may agree with her deductions and her reasonings, or you may discard them as you like, but if you sit through one of her lectures you will be fascinated in spite of yourself, and you will certainly, in an hour's talk from her, find much food for thought and, mayhap, the solution of many things that "the books" have not explained.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE NOTES

Edward Dufresne has been engaged by the Chicago Musical College for the faculty. Mr. Dufresne, of French parentage, has made notable successes as a concert singer since his debut in Paris as a pupil of Essanruel.

The closing concert of the Chicago Musical College's summer series will be given in Ziegfeld Theater, August 2, when the program will be presented by students of the Guest Teachers—Professor Leopold Auer, Percy Grainger, Oscar Saenger and Herbert Witherspoon.

Spaulding—Margaret Spaulding, Chicago soprano, who is spending the summer in Michigan, gave a recital at Charlotte last week which was a pronounced success in every way. The Charlotte Leader devotes a full column to the review of the event, which is pronounced by this paper to be one of the most important and most artistic events ever heard in Charlotte.

AUDITORIUM CONSERVATORY

All who attended the commencement recital of the Auditorium Musical-Dramatic Conservatory, under the direction of Karl B. Stein, president, were rewarded by a very interesting and highly satisfactory program of vocal and piano music and dramatic art. The piano numbers, taken from the Slavic and German school, were well chosen and played with scholastic taste and finish, particularly the work of Tatiana Vojan and Hazel Quirk.

The voice numbers ranged from operatic selections of Verdi and Offenbach, important works of English and American song writers, and were all given with the true musical value and correct interpretation which is characteristic of Dr. Stein's work. Emily Kartak and Marie Kordo showed especially good vocal training in operatic solos, and also gave a fine rendition of the Barcarolle, from "Tales of Hoffman." Skillful and sympathetic obligatos were furnished by Mignonette Schruta, violinist, and Paul Schoessling, cellist, who also played parts to the chamber music trios, adding variety and interest to the piano numbers.

The final number on the program was a clever little comedy by Mrs. Stein's pupils, three of whom, Emma Olson, Harriet Nilsen and Janet Havens, were in the graduating class. Their acting gave proof that they had gone through a systematic course of the most intelligent and up-to-date methods of teaching. The entire cast did very creditable work, and the play was most enjoyable.

All the singers, pianists and dramatic students who received certificates and diplomas demonstrated thoroughly the splendid grade of teaching received at this well-established institution, which is both incorporated under the laws of Illinois and accredited by the city Board of Education.

LENORA SPARKES

Lenora Sparkes, the Metropolitan Opera soprano, who is spending the summer in England, through a special arrangement with the opera management, will devote a considerable part of next season to concerts. She will sing the soprano part in "The Messiah" with the Reading (Pa.) Choral Society on January 26. She will then begin a tour of the South, which will extend as far as points in Florida, singing en route in Petersburg, Va.; Greenville, S. C., and other cities.

MISCHA LEVITZKI TO PLAY IN THE SOUTH

Texas and the Southwest will be visited by Mischa Levitzki for the first time next February. In addition to playing in several of the most important cities in Texas, he will also visit New Orleans, as he has been engaged by the Philharmonic Society for a recital on February 9. Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama and Tennessee will be other states which will be included on this particular tour.

———###———

Keep—Charles Keep, tenor, member of the faculty of Bethany College, at Lindsborg, Kan., is busy with a large summer class there until August 1. He sang recently as soloist with the Municipal Chorus at Wichita and was "Messiah" soloist in the Lindsborg Festival.

EMMA ROBERTS' MANY ENGAGEMENTS

Emma Roberts will make her first appearance in Bridgeport, Conn., on January 14 next, when she will give a joint recital with Elias Breeskin for the Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club. She will also give a recital in the series of the Greenville Lyceum Association of Furman University, Greenville, S. C., in November, when she will make an extensive tour of the South. She has also been engaged for J. Tom Roberts' course in Marion, Ind. The first New York recital by this eminent contralto, an event which has come to assume much more than ordinary importance in the musical life of the metropolis, is scheduled for January 9 at Aeolian Hall. As usual, Miss Roberts will bring forward a goodly list of novelties on that occasion, for her programs are always replete with new songs.

New York—The Beethoven Musical Society, under conductorship of Henry Lefkowitch, gave a concert in Central Park, New York, on July 16, and will give others on July 30 and August 13 and 27.

THE NEW STATE-LAKE THEATER

The theatrical district in Chicago has grown to be a very extended one, for, while the Blackstone on Eighth street marks its southern boundary, it now extends on the north to the corner of State and Lake streets, where the new vaudeville house bearing the name State-Lake has recently been opened.

And it is certainly some little distance between the two points mentioned.

At first thought it would scarcely seem that this new location would be one with the proper theatrical atmosphere, for, as matter of fact, it is rather far removed from any other theater, but the State-Lake evidently creates its own "atmosphere," as well as its own enormous clientele, and on the evening of my visit last week there were not only throngs inside the theater, but also other vast throngs outside waiting for admittance, and the spirit and the style of the place itself were such as to create the finest sort of environment and illusion.

A very large auditorium is the State-Lake, and a very beautiful one. It is more like Woods' new theater than any other in Chicago, but is much larger even than that.

Its colorings are very grateful to the eye, the furnishings of the house proper are very comfortable, and the service throughout is remarkably efficient.

There is a large orchestra, well directed and playing a good repertoire, and there is also an enormous organ, which, however, was not much used on the night under consideration.

The stage is very large and beautifully equipped, and as the bill (a continuous one) covers both photoplays and vaudeville, it is used to great advantage.

The bill presented last week included great variety and much of decided interest and value.

Better photoplays have been seen than "The Ride of Death," but none have been better put on or have had better musical accompaniment.

There were no definite "headliners" on the vaudeville bill, unless Montgomery and Allen may be designated as such, and yet the general excellence was marked.

There were some really wonderful Japs, in tumbling and juggling; some marvelous dogs, monkeys and an elephant, in a briskly moving act; a good deal of patter singing and smart talking (with absolutely no vulgarity); a quartet of negro singers, who did some Spirituales very well; some neat dancing, and various other things to interest and amuse.

Mr. Montgomery was far and away the most talented person on the stage during the evening, and his work was full of life and variety, while Miss Allen, a very pretty girl, with no voice to speak of, assisted gracefully.

Music at RAVINIA PARK

La Boheme

If by any unfortunate chance you should be compelled to choose just one performance this Summer at Ravinia Park, and could not attend any others, my first advice to you would be to select, without fail, a performance in which Florence Easton and Morgan Kingston were to appear opposite each other in leading roles.

For, beyond question, there has never been finer individual work than that done by these two, and never any ensemble at Ravinia between leading man and woman so altogether sympathetic and fine.

The performance of "La Boheme" on last Thursday night became, in their hands, sheer delight; and, fortunately, they were upheld in the perfect performance by the excellence of the Marcel of Picco, the Colline of Rothier, and the Schaunard of D'Angelo, to say nothing of the superexcellence of the orchestra's playing under the baton of Gennaro Papi and the fine work of the chorus and the solo singers who were assigned minor parts.

The stage setting was very creditable for the most part, but it ought to be suggested to the property man that snow should not descend in handfuls at one spot on the scene and not at all in other places.

But to return to Easton and Kingston.

"She is an ideal Mimi," said a lady near me, "for the part is certainly Easton herself."

"Yes," was the answer, "she looks and acts Mimi to perfection; but so she does the parts of Santuzza, Tosca, the Chinese woman in 'L'Oracolo' and everything else she presents; for, as a matter of fact, Florence Easton is a superb artist and is able to actually vivify and beautifully color every part in which she appears."

Her voice is so well rounded, so full and clear and yet, in the higher range, it is so exceptionally fragile as well as true that her singing is a constant delight, while her dressing and action are, as said before, perfection in every part she portrays.

Mr. Kingston finds in Rudolpho the part most absolutely fitted to him of any he has done at Ravinia, in my opinion, and his singing of the first act aria is a piece of work which cannot be surpassed by any tenor on the American stage today.

There is wonderful power and resonance to his tone, but this is beautifully conserved and handled, and the shading, coloring and finish of his work are beautiful indeed.

The big duet of the first act was a special triumph for both these singers, and the work in the third act was so well done as to wipe out of remembrance almost every other performance of the charming Puccini score.

Children's Concert

It was fitting that the record audience for Children's Day at Ravinia should be treated to one of the best entertainments Thursday afternoon there has ever afforded.

There was singing, under the direction of Miss Florence A. Crane, supervisor at Glencoe and South Chicago schools, and how the children sang! Then there was dancing, beautiful dancing, by the girls (most of them very young) of Mildred Brandham Pierce's classes. Miss Pierce's knowledge of the Russian dancing is well reflected in the lithe little pupils. Dancing is an art that is enjoyed by the average audience, and, in addition, it is an art which most children possess and should be given a chance to develop. The costuming on Thursday was varied and attractive.

And after the dancing came the lovely Lacombe march called "Tsigane," than which there are few compositions which better teach the child the sensory enjoyment of delicate music. Lacombe was not a prolific composer, but he was a masterly one, and it is interesting to contrast his work with that of Strauss, whose productions, so much more numerous, were represented on Thursday's program by the "One Thousand and One Nights" waltz.

The "Surprise Symphony" (Haydn) effected, as Mr. Hageman's interpretation required, absolute silence on the part of that immense outdoor audience. Only the Andante was played. The Delibes Intermezzo, "Naila," was linked with "Ave Maria" (Shubert) in a delightful double number, the latter selection being repeated (encore) upon the insistence of the audience.

LOUISE MORRIS.

Lakme

There was something about the surroundings which made the performance of "Lakme" last Sunday night at Ravinia particularly attractive. Perhaps it was Mabel Garrison, who sang the title role; perhaps Orville Harrold, who did Gerald, or Rothier (superb as Nilakantha) who made the charm of the performance. But perhaps it was none of these so much as the out-of-doors, the beautiful weather and the thrill of seeing the theater crowded, which made the appeal. For, dull as the story of the opera is, the music is wholly charming when heard under the proper conditions.

Never has this writer been more enchanted with the duet in the first act or with the Bell Song. The orchestra seemed in the best of humor (the chronicler had the infrequent advantage of sitting in the front row) and "played up" to the cast with an unusual amount of spirit.

Mr. Hageman was, as usual, the complete master. And there is no doubt that the sincerity and good-will of his personality is responsible, together with his superior musicianship, for his right to the title of master.

The following singers completed the cast with credit: Louis D'Angelo, Frederic; Alice Gentle, Mallika, and Louis Derman, Hadji. The chorus did splendid work and the whole performance was well managed.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

Other Bills

Tuesday evening last brought a repetition of "Il Trovatore," and on Wednesday the bill was "Tales of Hoffman," heard by a capacity audience.

Saturday evening was devoted to "Tosca," and the dramatic art and vocal charm of Florence Easton and Morgan Kingston again found fine play in the leading roles, there being adequate support from Rothier, Derman, Toft and Falco.

On Tuesday of this week "Cavalleria" was repeated; on Wednesday the first performance of "The Elixir of Love" reached the Ravinia stage, and on Thursday "Tosca" was repeated, "The Elixir of Love" being scheduled for repetition on Saturday evening.

The usual concerts were heard on Monday and Thursday and there will be given the weekly soldiers and sailors' concert this (Friday) afternoon, and symphony programs on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, with a special concert this evening with Riccardo Martin as soloist.

"TWILIGHT" — CLARA EDMUNDS-HEMINGWAY

The following note is one of several received by the composer during the past month:

"Dear Mrs. Hemingway: Your 'Twilight' is a very effective little song. I shall use it in my teaching." D. A. Clippinger.

Ten of the well-known Chicago teachers are using this delightful song for teaching, and several recitalists are to program it this season.

The worth of Mrs. Edmunds-Hemingway's compositions has been attested by the popularity of her recitals as a composer-contralto, and their musical worth is shown by the many notes of appreciation and good wishes for her compositions from artists and composers of the United States.

Ida Geer Weller, mezzo-contralto, New York, has paid this composer the signal honor of adding the manuscript song, "An Indian Lullaby," to her recital programs. Mrs. Weller will use this song upon her Woman Composers program, as well as others.

Mrs. Weller was one of the most popular soloists at the Lockport Festival last year and she has a voice of rare beauty as well as the gift of artistic interpretation.

The Pacific Coast Musician lists this song by Clara Edmunds-Hemingway, a Gary, Ind., composer, and speaks of it as "a melodious little song with cello obligato, written in the popular barcarolle rhythm." It is on sale by G. Schirmer, successors to R. W. Heffelfinger Company, Los Angeles.

From then on until Fall Mr. Baas will fill a number of dates with the International Quartet. This organization consists of four picked voices from the Mozart Club, a male choir of which Mr. Baas is director. The quartet has filled a number of dates at soldiers' homecoming celebrations in southern Wisconsin and has met with such marked success that its activities are being rapidly extended to more distant cities.

RIVER FOREST TENNIS CLUB ENTERTAINS

Again it was demonstrated on last Saturday evening that the River Forest Tennis Club is very fortunate in the possession of a member who is so amply and so artistically fitted to superintend its concerts as is Arthur Randolph Fraser, who at that time was responsible for a very charming summer night entertainment.

Of course, there was a dinner preceding and a dance afterward, and great sociability throughout. Those things are taken for granted, and they are always beautifully conserved by this club, but the fifty-minute concert is the item upon which attention must focus at this time, and it was truly a brilliant and very charming fifty minutes.

Master Lyman Eldredge, one of the solo choir boys at Mr. Fraser's church (Grace, in Oak Park), has been heard many times, and has always proven himself the possessor of a fine voice and, further, has shown a musicianship and an interpretative ability which have reflected immense credit always upon Mr. Fraser, who is, of course, his only teacher.

The fact that Master Eldredge was hoarse on Saturday night was therefore a very great disappointment, both to himself and to his many admirers, but it did not detract at all from the memory of other fine appearances or from the knowledge that there will be other and plentiful opportunities to hear him when he is in his normal and very beautiful voice.

Another talented pupil of Mr. Fraser is Elizabeth Harris, whose work has been commended in these columns a number of times.

Miss Harris is still a little girl, but she has developed a fine degree of technical attainment, and back of that there is nice appearance and poise, good intelligence and a very fine musical perception.

She played three numbers from the "Peer Gynt" Suite (Grieg) with good tone and much thought, and was facile and brilliant in the "Valse Caprice" (Whitney) and "Caprice" of Kriesler.

The mature artist of the program was Rollin Pease, baritone, who is a supreme favorite in Oak Park and River Forest, and who, whenever he appears there, is greeted with such cordiality and affection as would turn the head of a less sincere and serious artist.

Mr. Pease, the possessor of a suave and pleasing voice, has learned the value of high interpretative ideals as but few singers have learned them.

He places as a chief requisite in public work an enunciation that is well-nigh impeccable and which makes his songs almost like spoken stories.

Then he has great versatility, great variety and great originality, and in whatever he did on last Saturday night he found in his audience an answering vibration which was extremely unusual, and which must have thrilled him, even as he himself thrilled the audience.

His program included mostly well-known and equally well-liked numbers—just such a program as was best suited to the time and the place, and it was presented throughout with skill and musical effect.

The numbers were the Prologue from "Pagliacci," "Rolling Down to Rio" (German), "The Americans Come" (Fay Foster), "Don't Ceare" (Carpenter), "Uncle Rome" (Homer), and the Negro Spirituale, "Standin' in the Need of Prayer," besides a Humoreske which River Forest likes very much and which Mr. Pease must always sing "by request."

And if Mr. Fraser is skillful in the choice of his artists and in the arrangement of his program for these social events, he is also and equally felicitous in his piano accompanying.

A musician through and through, he has technic, routine and sympathetic impulse, and his work was therefore, on Saturday evening as always, alive with intelligence and beauty.

A ten-minute addenda of Community Singing, including "The Long, Long Trail," "The Home Road," and "Land of Mine" (three ideal numbers), proved the audience to be alert and musical and reflected fresh credit on Mr. Pease, who conducted, and Mr. Fraser, who played.

VOTICHENKO PAYS TRIBUTE TO ROSHANARA

Among the interesting numbers which will be heard at Votichenko's next Composition Recital in the fall is a minuet dedicated to Roshanara, the beautiful East Indian dancer who appeared at Votichenko's last recital of the season, which was entitled "Concert Intime De Musique Ancienne." "The Song of the Chain," a composition which was suggested to Votichenko by the plight of the Siberian prisoners, will also be played for the first time.

CHRISTINE LANGENHAN SINGS AT RIVERSIDE

Mme. Christine Langenhan, the dramatic soprano, who appeared last night at the Loring Theater under the auspices of the Junior College, is winning a place for herself as a true artist in the musical world. She gave a program of such unusual variety as to make her coming an event.

It was in the Bohemian number, "Songs My Mother Taught Me," that she charmed most. The song is one of those lovely bits of folk melody which Dvorak has crystallyzed into permanent form and to which he has added exquisite harmonies. For an encore Mme. Langenhan gave the English translation, which does not spoil the fairy-like rhythm of the song as translations so often do.

In her French selections Mme. Langenhan was especially pleasing in a fantastic bit by Saint-Saens, "Guitares and Mandolines," an unusual fragmentary thing that ends abruptly. Her singing of Massenet's "Elegie" was exquisite, too. The Italian number, an aria from "Gioconda," contained a good deal of sustained recitative, which was artistically done.

Of her English numbers the classical selections of Handel and Haydn, with which she opened the program, gave her splendid opportunity to display her excellent technic. Vanderpool's "I Did Not Know" was probably one of the most popular numbers of the evening, and Cadman's "Land of the Sky Blue Water" was, as always, a favorite.

Maña-Zucca's "Star of Gold," a brilliant piece of coloratura, closed the program with a display of pyrotechnics. The ever-popular "Annie Laurie" was one of the many encores of the singer, whose graciousness induced her to respond to the enthusiasm of her hearers.—Riverside Enterprise.

LEVITZKI NOT TO GO TO THE PACIFIC COAST THIS SEASON

Although Mischa Levitzki has already been announced by both L. E. Behmyer of Los Angeles and Selby Oppenheimer of San Francisco as one of the artists to be presented in their territory the coming season, by mutual consent of Daniel Mayer and the aforementioned western managers, the tour has been postponed for a year. Owing to the fact that he will have a long and arduous season, although only part of it will be spent in America, Mr. Levitzki will not play until after November 1. In April he sails for Australia, where already he has twenty-five recitals booked. Mr. Mayer has already so many engagements booked for him in the East and Middle West between November and March that the Pacific Coast cities will have to wait until the following season to hear this sensationally successful young pianist.

Droop Not, Young Lover ..... Handel
The Hundred Pipers ..... Old Scotch

Mr. Nordin

Minuet in Olden Style ..... Hochstein
Humoresque ..... Stoessel

Mr. Leach

Prologue (from I Pagliacci) ..... Leoncavallo

Mr. Nordin

Accompaniments by Ruth Bradley

Mr. Nordin sang with a real appreciation of the classic numbers and gave a rollicking, typical atmosphere to the old Scotch song. The Prologue was done with dramatic intention and carried over with considerable style.

As fine as is the Saint-Saens Concerto, Mr. Leach made his big impression in the second group. The three concluding numbers were all charming, delicate and refreshing and played with excellent discrimination and taste. The "Humoresque" had to be repeated.

In addition to the work of these artists, a third attraction of the afternoon was the playing of Mme. Rive-King, one of the revered members of the Bush Conservatory faculty and one of America's most distinguished pianists. Mme. King has a brilliant, flashing technic and puts all of her magnetic, forceful personality into her playing, thus making it one of the most impressive events possible. For an encore she played nine of the set of thirty-three variations on "Yankee Doodle" written by Rubinstein, with whom she studied.

All the pupils gave evidence of good schooling, and some of the more advanced displayed a well-developed and brilliant technic. Especially noteworthy was the playing of Miss Lavinia Kent, whose work has been eulogized previously in these columns, and of Mr. Arthur Lang, who played the Grieg Concerto movement with electrifying vigor.

LYCEUM ARTS CONSERVATORY

The fall announcement of the Lyceum Arts Conservatory contains the interesting information to all music lovers of the middle west of the addition to the faculty of Theodore Harrison, who has been the head of the vocal department of the University School of Music in Ann Arbor, Mich., for the last five years. Mr. Harrison's reputation precedes his appearance in Chicago both as a great singer and teacher. For more than seven years he was engaged in opera and concert work abroad, and on the breaking out of the World War he was under a five year contract to appear in the leading opera houses of Germany and Austria.

He returned to America and made a number of important recital appearances in the east, and after much urging accepted the position at Ann Arbor, where his methods of teaching and his successful students soon made his department the center of interest in the school, as many of the best singers of Chicago, Detroit and New York made Ann Arbor a Mecca. These professionals urged him constantly to seek a larger field.

Mr. Harrison has helped materially in making the great Ann Arbor Festival the success it has enjoyed and his sterling musicianship has gained for him the respect of all the great singers and soloists who have appeared there.

The Lyceum Arts Conservatory has been in correspondence with Mr. Harrison for the last three years, but his loyalty to the University School precluded his acceptance of the inducements they offered, and only upon the advice of Chicago's greatest musicians was he made to realize his field of work and influence could be enlarged and that Chicago needed him.

Mr. Harrison's career is a splendid one, both in America and Europe. He has appeared repeatedly with the great orchestra and choral societies and is well known as a recital artist of distinction. He taught in Italy and Germany with much success.

His voice is of exceptional beauty and power, perfectly trained and controlled. His interpretation and unfailing surety of tone—his complete familiarity with four languages—means a flawless diction which is rarely equaled.

He has already been engaged as soloist with several of our finest musical organizations and his debut will be an event to be watched with interest by all music lovers.

SOCIETY OF AMERICAN SINGERS

General Manager William Wade Hinshaw announces that he has purchased from Albert Reiss the "exclusive production rights" of H. E. Krehbiel's book, "The Impresario," music by Mozart, and which was given with such great distinction and success by the Society of American Singers under the direction of Mr. Reiss at its initial season at the Lyceum Theater in 1917. Mr. Hinshaw announces that "The Impresario" will be given by the Society of American Singers at the Park Theater early in the season next Fall, with David Bispham in the title role and with Lucy Gates in the part of Uhlig, in which she made such a distinct hit in the original production. Mr. Bispham's characterization of the doughty "operatic director" was one of his greatest and most amusing masterpieces of art. The other members of the cast will be Ruth Miller as Mme. Lange, Craig Campbell as Mozart, and Bertram Peacock as the Nephew.

After being given seven times at the Park Theater in New York Mr. Hinshaw plans to send this opera to several near-by towns under the direction of Sam Franko.

A number of other one-act operas without chorus will be given, including "The Maid Mistress" (Pergolese), "Bastien and Bastienne" (Mozart), "Il Signor Bruschino" (Rossini), to which Sigmund Spaeth has made a very smart and up-to-date libretto; "Les Precieuse Ridicule" (Anselm Goetzl), book translated from Moliere by Alice Mattulath; "The Rose of Auvergne" (Offenbach), and "Cox and Box" (Sullivan).

Mr. Franko's orchestra will be taken on all trips outside of the city, and it is planned to have Mr. Franko, who conducted the premier performances of "The Impresario," to personally conduct all performances of this opera, both at the Park Theater and on road tours.

SALVINI'S SUMMER SEASON

Mario Salvini, the eminent Italian vocal instructor, is continuing his activities throughout the summer. He successfully directs the Salvini School of Singing at 206 West Seventy-first street, finding time every week to devote several days to his special classes in a beautiful residence at Edgemere, Long Island. Mr. Salvini is full of enthusiasm and an ardent advocate not only of the artistic, but of all that promotes health and true progress. He frequently rides on horseback at Edgemere, after which he finds time to go for a dip in the sea. He is looking more handsome and inspiring than ever, and his students, many of whom will be heard in public next season, in church, oratorio, opera, recital and concert, reflect his masterly attainments and buoyancy of spirits.

ELIAS BREESKIN TO PLAY IN THE SOUTH

Elias Breeskin, the young Russian violinist, won so many new friends when he appeared with Caruso in the South that he will make a tour of that part of the country next March. Among his engagements at that time will be a recital at Furman University, Greenville, S. C. He will also give a joint recital with Emma Roberts for the Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club of Bridgeport on January 14. Mr. Breeskin will be the soloist with the Stadium Symphony Orchestra on July 31.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Russian Symphony Orchestra, Modest Altschuler, conductor, has been engaged by the Reading Choral Society of Reading, Pa., for its winter festival, which will take place on January 26, 1920. In the afternoon the orchestra will be heard in a program of its own with Emma Roberts, contralto, as soloist. In the evening "The Messiah" will be sung, under the baton of the society's conductor, Henry F. Seibert. The quartet of soloists will consist of Lenora Sparkes, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Emma Roberts, contralto; James Price, tenor, and Malcolm McEachren, basso. This engagement will be the opening one in the season's second tour of the orchestra. The arrangements have been made through Daniel Mayer, who is manager for both soloists and orchestra.

"NOTHING FOR NOTHING"

By HENRY B. RONEY

Editor Music News: You said something when you started that "Nothing for Nothing" slogan. But there must be exceptions—the patriotic affair where no participant is paid and we simply must do our bit; philanthropies, in prisons, hospitals, asylums, where all ought to contribute to the happiness of the unfortunate and help in the uplift; our own church occasionally where our religious obligations call upon us to give either professional services or money; a charitable affair once in a while where every service is contributed free.

I pity the shriveled souls that do not take delight in ministering to the needy, suffering or unfortunate ones who cannot pay, with whatever talent God has dowered them, when it can be done at no money cost—merely inconvenience, perhaps, which should be counted a pleasure. Heart happiness and contentment is life's richest blessing, and it can be purchased only by unselfishness and thoughtfulness for the happiness of others.

Never forgetting my early struggles for a musical education, and gratitude to my teachers for special favors, I want to "pass it on." And I have done this so many times in apparently worthy cases that I find myself wondering if there is any such thing among music students as real, steadfast, loyal appreciation and reciprocation. The few cases in a long experience, which stand out like shining gold in an ocean of dross, are all that prevent my becoming a hopeless skeptic.

But we must differentiate between plain duty and plain sponging. Lucky lawyers, doctors, dentists, scientists, and other professional men! They usually escape. It is the musician or singer who is always expected to bear the brunt of free services. Then there are the poor, but talented, whom we always have with us. They want instruction, always from teachers of high standing, but their families assert that they cannot afford to pay the term bills. Won't the teacher give his services gratuitously? "Good advertising. Such talent!"

Some of these cases are genuine, and every professional man with a heart remembers his own youthful struggles and economies, and wants to help. The majority, however, are leeches and chronic beggars. They have the faculty of "using the truth with penurious frugality." They talk poor, have no money to pay an instructor who has devoted his life to preparation for high-class pedagogic work, yet they always have money for silks, velvets, muskrat coats, finery and expensive flats. How can we distinguish gold from dross—the worthy from the unworthy—until we have been stung?

People who would scorn to ask a merchant to donate to them dresses, shoes or groceries, or go to a physician and ask for free treatment, do not hesitate to ask a singer or music instructor to give them gratis many valuable hours of his time. This time and professional knowledge are as much his capital and stock in trade as the merchant's cash in bank or goods on his shelves.

Time is money. It costs the teacher time and money in large measure to fit himself for the very services which many people resort to every device of sympathy and misrepresentation to secure without compensation. The fact that the teacher may have some spare time does not alter the principle. Many railroad trains have vacant seats which could be filled with deadheads without increased cost to the railroad company, but you will observe that they remain empty.

I yield to no one in generous impulses toward talented students with small means, yet I presume I have been victimized oftener than any professional man in Chicago by these hypocritical ingrates. They pretend great affection, friendship and loyalty as long as free instruction holds out, and then break promises and verbal contracts and desert you for any teacher who flatters more. Ignoring all past obligations, they repay by speaking of you in derogatory terms when they can no longer impose on your generosity.

I have made a psychological study of many such cases of ingratitude, to determine, if possible, their proportions and relation to nationalities and to professed religions. I cite a few examples in my experience, leaving the reader to draw his own conclusions.

Case 1. Being far from organ repairers, I learned to tune and regulate the church organ at which I officiated in my youth. After several years of this gratuitous service to the church, and quite outside my regular duties, I was informed by one of the trustees that it "was my business to keep the organ in tune and repair it, the same as a violinist kept his instrument in tune."

Nationality, American; religion, Congregational.

Case 2. I gave a boy singer a large amount of intensive training, his father agreeing that I should have his services in concert work in return for his musical education. When he was sufficiently advanced and had begun to attract attention, the father broke his signed contract on the pretext that "his duty required him to put his boy in school," and took him away—not to school, but to travel with him and sing at his itinerant lectures, advertised him as "one of the famous 'Roney Boys,'" and took up a collection at each lecture for his own benefit. Chuckling over his dishonesty, he remarked: "Roney can't do anything to me. I haven't so much as a handkerchief he can get."

Nationality, American; religion, Methodist.

Case 3. A church contracted with me for a concert by a noted star attraction, upon which they expected to make hundreds of dollars. Bad weather and inefficient management reduced receipts, and there was a small deficit. They refused to pay the full amount of the guarantee "because they did not take it in," obliging me to pay their losses as well as my own.

Nationality, American; religion, Methodist.

Case 4. Contracted with the parents of a boy to educate him vocally, in return for which he was to give me certain services in singing, when qualified, as compensation for his tuition fees and education. After three years of free instruction and devotion to the boy's musical interests, the parents broke their contract and took him elsewhere without a "thank you" to me, or other sign of appreciation. The boy had the training and I the experience, a teacher's frequent reward when he places too much faith in human honor.

Nationality, Jewish.

Case 5. Similar. Befriended and helped a boy, at his mother's importunities and oft-repeated declarations of undying loyalty and unending appreciation; gave him practically free vocal instruction for about two years upon promises that after being qualified he would repay me by his services at concerts. After arduous training, when he began to sing in public and get a few newspaper puffs, his mother, in total disregard of her written promises and of common honesty, took him to pastures she thought more alluring, suppressed in advertisements all mention of his indebtedness to my foundation work, and took all the credit to herself. I had my usual experience with such ingrates, and was repaid for the countless hours I devoted to the boy's free instruction by her speaking ill of me and my work.

Nationality, American; religion, Methodist.

Case 6. Similar. Gave practically free vocal instruction to girl for about two and a half years on account of marked talent and the family's representation of inability to pay, and an understanding of reciprocal services, as in previous cases. When I finally intimated that free instruction could not continue indefinitely and suggested a moderate tuition, the pupil was taken to another teacher and a good price paid for the instruction, but not a word of appreciation of my lavish devotion to the child's music interests. But they do not forget to repay in the coin characteristic of ingrates, by disparaging remarks, now that further free instruction is denied.

Nationality, Jewish.

Case 7. Girl of exceptional vocal talent. Gave a year's free instruction and continued it a second year, also admitting a sister to same privilege, on account of representations that they were "too poor" to pay anything. Showed outward appearance of appreciation, but later, when they had money to spend for instruction, they paid it to another teacher, who had done absolutely nothing for them.

Nationality, Jewish.

Case 8. Twenty young men enrolled at one time for piano lessons at a leading school. Each paid $5.00 on account and began lessons. Bills for balance were sent, ignored, repeated, ignored again. Time slipped along, and by the time they were finally notified that they must pay up or quit they had each received nearly two terms' instruction. The bunch then all left, enrolled at another conservatory and worked precisely the same game, each securing nearly two terms' lessons for the $5.00 first payment. When again notified to pay up or quit, these guileless students of the divine art again left in a body, and for a third time deposited $5.00 each at another conservatory and started to work the same game again. By this time the first two schools had compared experiences, the third institution was advised as to what to expect, and the little game was blocked. Some system, eh!

Nationality, Jewish.

Case 9. Wisconsin town. Superintendent of schools begged me to have "Roney's Boys" sing a few selections at the high school, where I was to give a talk on music, representing that they would have a lecture course the next winter and would surely want my company as one of the attractions. I broke a rule for once and consented. I sent him a reminder of his promise, but he had no further use for me after getting the free services of my company.

Nationality, American; religion, hadn't any.

Few professional people there are who have not had similar experiences. Of course it is easy to say, "Sue them for breach of contract." But there is no satisfaction in sending good money after bad. Such people are usually irresponsible and morally bankrupt. If suit would have to be brought in another city, the time, cash expense and risk makes litigation a foolish proceeding. With most of the people who seek such favors an agreement, written, verbal or implied, means nothing. A contract is merely a "scrap of paper." Devoid of honor or appreciation, they think of no one but themselves, and break any agreement whatsoever on the slightest pretext.

It therefore becomes a puzzling question to a teacher with broad sympathies and a desire to help promising and worthy talent to come to full fruition, to know just when to steel his heart, when there seems to be no definite way to distinguish in advance the shameless, self-seeking ingrates from the truly worthy.

Free services are never rated at their full value, simply because they are free. Definite free scholarships, after competitive examination do not come within the category. Deadhead pupils who seem to have money for everything except musical instruction, and drift from teacher to teacher, always speaking disparagingly of the previous teacher who befriended them, should be sifted out. Some kind of an association among teachers who have been stung by these floating tricksters, and a blacklist such as merchants maintain for mutual protection, might be a good thing. The experiences and opinion of others of the profession would be interesting to the entire pedagogic body.

CALIFORNIA CONVENTION

California State Music Teachers' Ninth Annual Meeting at San Francisco and Berkeley University, California

By S. W. MOUNTZ OF LOS ANGELES

The assembling of the professional music teachers of the state, on Saturday evening, July 5, to the number of several hundred or more, proved an event of more than usual interest.

The reception of an hour of greetings was interrupted by Arthur Farwell, president of the San Francisco section, who made a brief talk and introduced Miss Leone Nesbit, a pianist of great technical attainments, and who, by her charm and artistry, got the ear of her audience and held them spellbound to the end in, first, a MacDowell, the Fourth Polonaise, following it with the Debussy "Arabesque" and the Rubinstein Etude, C Major. In the first and last selections much dash, agility and freedom of expression were manifest; in the "Arabesque" marked imagination. She responded to a vigorous encore demand. She is advanced preceptress in the Jenkins School of Music, Oakland.

Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, soprano, a longtime popular singer of this city, rendered a group of songs from Brahms, Dvorak, Carpenter and Rachmaninoff in pleasing style, voice and diction, Miss Beatrice Clifford at piano.

The three violin selections from Tartini-Kreisler, Tschaikowsky and Wieniawski, played by Miss Mary Passmore, with her sister, Susanne Brooks-Passmore, at the piano, were masterly pieces of violin work, showing musicianship and careful study, and assuring presence.

Miss Helen Colburn Heath, soprano, gave a splendid group in Italian from Vidal, Widor and Puccini, showing a schooled student. In her encore in English she gave additional pleasure in good diction. Mrs. Paul Jarboe gracefully assisted at the piano.

The social lasted to the reversing hours of the dial, and the ninth annual session fully opened.

Sunday, 2 to 5 p. m., at the Palace of Fine Arts, Exposition Grounds, a very interesting State Composers' program was rendered by authors and assisting artists of fine ability, Mme. Emelie Tojetti, chairman, introducing Mme. Sofia Neustadt, state president, who preluded in a brief address on the interest of promoting composition and affording their works a favorable hearing. The entire program was highly praiseworthy.

Pierre Douillet, pianist, gave five short works of his own, some in the higher grades and serviceable for concert programs. His technic and interpretation sustained a high rank as musician and artist composer.

Mrs. Mary Green Payson presented three serviceable songs. Alfreda Beatty Allen, mezzo-soprano, sang, effectively, "Her Love," "Hauntings," and "Gold," "Frankincense" and "Myrrh" in serial form (three in one), the author at the piano.

Sonate in A Major, Opus 14, for violin and piano, by Harold Webster, was delivered by Sigmund Beel, violinist, and George S. McManus, two first-class artists, musicians in all the niceties of the work of high musical values. Four songs by Abbie Gerrish-Jones were finely sung by Miss Emilie Lancel, the author at the piano, and Mrs. Cecil Hollis Stone, accompanist, was a very good adjunct to their presentation. The titles were: "Hidden Thought," "Egypt," "Sleep, My Jewel," and "Nile Song." All were strongly oriental, but very effective. The singing was in most delightful quality of voice and with good delivery of the text.

"To the Moon" and "Ferry Hinksey," from the pen of Albert Elkus, with the author at the piano, were sung finely by Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, soprano.

The closing group was from our Los Angeles composer, Mrs. Gertrude Ross—"Desert Dawn," "Madonna," and "Peace"—and had a good presentation in Jack Edward Hillman's fine baritone voice. In his encore he sang the "Open Road," by the same author, Mrs. Hollis Stone in the piano support.

The evening program was at the Civic Auditorium, an organ recital by Edwin H. Lemare, who gave one hundred programs at the Panama Exposition, which organ is now installed in this auditorium, and he is engaged as official organist of San Francisco.

The second part of the program was the patriotic cantata, "Chant of Victory," by Director Arthur Farwell. It was given by a chorus of several hundred voices, assisted by Homer Henley, baritone; Miss Ruth Jensen ("America"), reader; Samuel J. Hume ("Poet"), reader, the reading being interspersed by national songs and other patriotic selections, in which the audience participated. Mrs. Roeckel-Davis and Lincoln S. Bacheldor were the piano accompanists and William W. Carruth, organist. The work is well conceived and highly serviceable for patriotic festivals.

Monday, July 7, a. m. The state president, Mrs. Neustadt, presented Arthur Farwell, who gave the welcoming address. His theme was the democratization of music and the affiliation with civic efforts. The state president responded in complimentary recognition for the helpfulness of the members in bringing the annual to full fruition.

Piano Round Table, Albert Elkus, chairman, drew out helpful and practical suggestions from many experienced teachers full of values. This was continued with a piano recital, with verbal observation on "Some Aspects of the Eighteenth Century Music," by Elizabeth Simpson, which was very interesting in suggestion and demonstration in the Mozart and Haydn, so nicely played by the lecturer. A group of six of the French clavecinistes, in Old Time Dances, used largely in the court life of the date, were given.

Miss Marjory Marknes Fisher, in a Grieg Sonata for violin and piano, Opus 13, had a fine rendition, Mrs. Elsie Cooke Hughes taking the fine piano work. Later Mrs. Hughes more fully demonstrated her pianistic mastership in "Romance," by Sibelius, and Schubert-Tausig "March Militaire." In the afternoon the Savannah String Quartet gave Opus 15, by Dohnanyi, and a quintet, by Dvorak, John C. Manning at the piano in a great accompaniment. The combination is of excellent ability and gave an excellent rendition.

Marion Vecki assisted as a baritone soloist in a group of six songs from Haydn, Brahms, Duparc, Fourdrain, Gabrilowitsch and Ganz. His singing is in good style, voice pleasing and elicited hearty applause. Mrs. Vecki was effective at the piano. Addresses were made by Julian R. Waybur on "Music Extension in the University of California"; Mrs. Nellie Strong Stevenson on "Library Extension," and Mrs. Fredericks, Librarian, at San Francisco. This department of the university is doing fine educational work in the smaller towns in presenting very good programs by professional talent under their management. It is not very remunerative to the talent, but some publicity, as well as good leaven to develop musical taste and appreciation, which extends to the remotest part of the state. The expenses are fully covered, a good audience is secured, the good spirit of the cultural side of education is extended, a reciprocity established for the outlay for the support of educational propaganda. Miss Amy Holman, contralto, gave two groups of songs by D'Erlanger, Bemberg, Salter, Scott, Crist and Lidgey. Miss Beatrice Clifford, as accompanist, was very effective. "L'Angelus" (Breton folk tune) was greatly enjoyed.

Mrs. Nellie Strong Stevenson, in two groups of piano selections, ten in number, gave evidence of a broad field of study and an equipment of technical facility of a master artist. She combines the accomplishment of lecturer, teacher and artist in a high degree.

Mrs. Florine Wenzel read a brief but excellent paper on "The Benefits of Belonging to a Local Association," encouraging such membership for the union of effort and the inspiration it gives to all to reach an objective point of the society.

The Monday evening session was given to Los Angeles and San Diego talent. Mr. John Smallman, baritone, opened with Moussorgsky's "Death Serenade," accompanied by Mrs. Halbert Thomas of Pasadena, who later appeared in a list of piano solos of American composers, representing Mrs. Alexander Mason of Chicago, Augusta Zuckerman of New York, Samuel Bollinger of St. Louis, and MacDowell's "First Movement of the Keltic Sonata No. 4." Her playing was thoroughly artistic, showing fine delineations in interpretation.

Miss Grace Viersen, lyric soprano, in two groups of French, Russian and English songs entranced her audience with a beautiful, clear voice. The Handel "Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" Tosti's "Comme Va," Puccini's "One Step More," Cyril Scott's "Lilac Time," and "Little Snowflakes," by Rimsky-Korsakow, were especially enjoyed and well sung.

In a second group Mr. Smallman presented "Chinese Mother Goose Rhymes," by Brainbridge-Crist. These were much enjoyed, and Mr. Smallman was free and natural in their text delivery. His closing group comprised "Two Songs from the West," by Cadman, the words being by Charles Farwell Edson. Titles were "The West" and "Requiescat." To tumultuous applause he gave an encore, "Sylvia" (Oley Speakes).

Alfreda Beatty Allen of San Diego sang a group of four songs most entertainingly, with accompaniments by Mrs. Mary Gray Payson; "A Cesti," aria; "Mood," by Miss Price of San Diego; "Spring Song," by Rubinstein, and Woodman's "Birthday" and an encore. The full-day program ended with piano selections by Edward Schlossberg, a pianist with wonderful skill, who gave six piano solos from the ultra-modern school of music composition. We gave marked and respectful attention and tried to receive it as music, but doubted if it were. The selections, two from Blanchet, Debussy's "Submerged Cathedral," Rhene Baton and Ravel numbers, and "Rhapsodie," by Dohnanyi. Will we ever accept it as music? Or, what is music?

Tuesday morning sessions were held in the Fairmont, in San Francisco; the Round Table, on "Voice Production." Mr. William Edwin Chamberlain, chairman. Much interest was manifest early and prominent teachers gave short talks. The many good suggestions given in what was good singing there was general agreement, but as to how to attain it the routes varied. All felt training the mentality versus heedless practice was the short cut to success vocally. Exercises without mind concentration seldom reach the goal.

In the absence of Mrs. Friend, Mrs. Dunham of Berkeley, a soprano of fine reputation as an interpretative singer. They were more of the popular character than the classic, as "Cowboys," "Deep River," "Old Maids" song, and, in encore, the "Banjo Song."

Miss Ruth Pepper at piano.

Miss Hazel M. Pritchard, pianist, of Sacramento, gave two groups of great works from Grieg, Chopin, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and responded with a brilliant encore number.

The addresses on "Community Singing" by Alexander Stewart and Wallace Moody were good. Arthur Farwell had spoken to the same point during the sessions. All three were full of experience in the service work during the years of conflict. Much effort is being put forth to the end that we become a singing people.

The afternoon and evening sessions were held at the University of California at Berkeley. On the lawn, with wood-wind quintet music, esthetic dancing was performed, illustrating the Greek plays, by very attractive groups of maidens and children. In the Faculty Glade, among the live oaks and shrubbery, quite a large audience rested upon the lawn and hillside under the wide-spreading aged trees, making a very realistic scene. The convention assembled in Wheeler Hall, a fine auditorium in honor of Benjamin Ide Wheeler, who is now retiring after twenty years or more as president of one of the best institutions of learning in the U. S. A. He becomes President Emeritus. We listened to a fine piano recital by Thomas Frederick Freeman of the music department.

Mrs. J. Rollin Fitch sang a group of pleasing songs with Miss Beatrice Clifford as accompanist.

An address on "Development of Musical Education of the Child," by Miss Cora Jenkins. Helpful suggestions by an experienced teacher.

Mr. H. B. Wilson, superintendent of Berkeley public instruction, delivered a very able lecture on "Co-operation in Education." He mentioned the great values of music as a factor in education and in the life of the individual, the community, and social and religious morale of citizenship.

"Credits" for music study by outside music teachers enlisted marked interest. Plans were suggested to the end of securing a rating in their high school and university degrees. To secure these credits a course of music study must be secured and an examining board pass upon the results of the test.

The evening session was a concert in the Great Greek Theater, the gift of the Hearsts to the University of California. It is spacious, 10,000 or more. The acoustics are fine in the surrounding of a eucalyptus forest, cement terraced seats and stage and pillars of the same; all open overhead, a grand stage for pageants and spectacular demonstrations.

Signor Antonio de Grassi, violinist, rendered Mendelssohn's violin "Concerto in E Minor" in the height of artistry, George Stewart McManus ably supporting him at the piano. He played a fine encore number.

Mrs. Vernice Brand, a dramatic mezzo-soprano, sang the great Aria from Bach's "St. Mathews' Passion" and the Aria from "Jeanne d'Arc" by Tschaikowsky. In both these selections violin obligato by Mr. De Grasse. Mr. McManus at the piano.

Her singing was great, true, fine diction.

A chorus of 200 voices sang two choruses from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "He Watcheth Over Israel" and "Thanks Be to God," Paul Steindorff conducting.

The business meeting at the Fairmont and the banquet at 6 p. m. was not only a great feast of good viands, but a flow of soul, witty toasts and crisp, short speeches, Mrs. Cecil Marks toastmistress, who happily introduced the leading spirits of the association, songs by Mr. Vecki and others, closing with an impromptu comedy operetta, full of good humor and extravaganza.

The convention was one of the most successful ever held. Programs and artists of the best caliber to interpret them. Few disappointments. Attendance entirely too small for so great an event in the fine culture and art of music.

Mrs. Morris Rosenwald

Mrs. Krum is not alone a teacher who insists upon a poetic ideal for each number presented and who knows exactly how to apply nuance and color to every song she teaches, but also she is one who insists upon the most definite and exact of musicianship; and in this insistence she includes the fact of clear and logical enunciation and presentation of text.

Each song given at this concert was, therefore, filled with musical beauty as well as that other and very definite charm which comes from intelligent handling of any art subject.

It is impossible to detail the work of every singer on a program of such length, and yet every one of the students must be included in a general commendation for poise, style and definite finish.

The average of really good voices in the Krum class is a very high one, and there is always with each pupil such a careful use of the given equipment that the best possible results are achieved.

Specially to be noted in this concert was the return of Lilian White-Freyn after a long absence, and her voice was found to be, as always, a beautiful one, under splendid control.

Eva Gordon, an exceptional contralto, whose voice and musicianship have already been warmly commended in Music News, again proved her fine values. She is definitely entering the professional field and already has fifteen good engagements for next season.

Rarely have Negro Spirituals been so well done as they were at this time by Cleo Silberman, who has an especial gift in this direction.

Mabel Nevin-Schoolfield, a member of the famous Nevin family, is also the possessor of a lovely voice and style, while the singing of Jennie L. Kahn, especially in her upper score, is at a point of sweetness and clarity but rarely attained by any student.

Mrs. Krum has had a very busy season, and such is the demand for lesson periods this Summer that she finds it difficult to plan any vacation whatever.

In her Summer class there are talented pupils from Minnesota, Kansas, Indiana and Wisconsin, besides the usual large quota of young Chicago artists. C. E. W.

EASTLAKE-KIERNAN

Eleanor Eastlake and Kathryn Kiernan, two of our delightful young artists, who have done such interesting work together in their duet singing, are steadily enlarging their activities in this line and, under the management of Harriet Martin Snow, have already accepted several engagements for the coming season. The various clubs in and about Chicago are more than eager to procure them for programs, and the two charming singers have planned many interesting programs of solo and duet numbers.

They are engaged to appear in Orchestra Hall the first week in September, likewise by the Ridge Woman's Club for their October program, and by the Englewood Woman's Club for a program in March.

MAY PETERSON AT JACKSONVILLE FESTIVAL

The following comment is from the Jacksonville (Fla.) Florida Metropolis:

"A glowing climax for the first Music Festival of Jacksonville in five years was May Peterson, Metropolitan Opera soprano, who was heard here last night at the Duval Theater. From the first limpid note in Pergoliesi's "Nina" to the deep, dramatic tones of "Love Is the Wind," her farewell number, she was exquisite.

"The house last night was scarcely filled to the twentieth row, which is typical of Jacksonville's appreciation of an artist of international fame. Those who were present, however, were held spellbound by the vivid personality and glorious voice of the young prima donna.

"There was something else about May Peterson that won her audience. It was a sense of nearness and flow of sympathetic feeling, linking her with every individual present as if she sang for each person alone.

"From a group of airy fantasies she carried her audience to the "Air de Manon," by Massenet, which displayed her depth and range. The beauty of a program by May Peterson, which touches the average music lover as well as the musician, is her choice of many simple English selections. With her remarkably clear diction and rare power of expression she gives to her numbers a colorful interpretation that holds her audience.

"I'm Wearing Awa', Jean," a simple Scotch poem of memorable beauty, was chosen for an encore to her third group of songs. Miss Peterson developed the haunting sweetness of the simple melody with the soul of an artist. Then, after a few introductory notes, she swung her audience from emotional heights to merry humor in a dainty little lullaby by Moussorgsky, "The Doll's Cradle Song." One could see the small girl crooning to her doll as it lay cradled in her arms.

"While the entire program last evening was thoroughly enjoyed, it was not until the Russian ballad, "Deep in Love Was I," by Rachmaninoff, was sung that Miss Peterson's voice reached its possibilities. As the last sobbing notes of the beautiful number died away there was a hush over the house that lasted a full half minute.

"One of the most attractive features of May Peterson's performance was her colorful descriptions of her numbers in French. Possessing a personality free from self-consciousness and restraint, it was as if she reached out and touched hands with each of her listeners."

"THE POEMS AND PROSE POEMS OF CHARLES BEAUDELAIRE"

Introduction and Preface by James Gibbons Huneker

(Publisher: Brentano, New York)

What Edgar Allen Poe is to America Charles Beaudelaire is to France. This applies to their nationality only, for artistically both geniuses are the property of the universe; all may enjoy their unique gifts as poets, and the whole world is in accord concerning their greatness. I mentioned Poe because many accuse Beaudelaire of plagiarizing his works, but the American genius was different from Beaudelaire in the expression of his mentality. There was also a contrast in personalities; Beaudelaire was "un enfant gai," while Poe was rather the man without a smile. Beaudelaire is known but little in our country. Last season Yvette Guilbert featured the French genius in her intime recitals—splendid translations are available. There is a preface by the eminent critic, James Gibbons Huneker, who gives us not only a biographical sketch of Beaudelaire, but he analyzes the French author. Huneker is the litterateur among critics, an authority not comparable to any of his colleagues. He knows literature thoroughly, and is a competent essayist. As a literary critic he surpasses his work as a music critic. In the latter he errs often, but in literature he is the writer with few equals. The book is worthy to adorn the library of the genuinely cultured mind.

The Appleton Press Comment on Cleveland Bohnet

Cleveland Bohnet also received the enthusiastic applause of his audience, and at no time was there any doubt as to the conception, technical adequacy and thoughtful interpretation of the numbers he chose as vehicles for his expression. Mr. Bohnet's personality lends an added impressiveness to his playing. In no single number did Mr. Bohnet fail to reveal his artistry.—Appleton (Wis.) Evening Crescent.

Mr. Bohnet scored a complete success also. He opened with a group from the old classical writers, Scarlatti, Mozart and Bach. The Mozart "Pastoral Variee" was played most sympathetically.—Appleton (Wis.) Daily Post.

Marie Kern-Mullen

The soloist, Marie Kern-Mullen, possesses a beautiful mezzo-contralto voice of large range and exquisite timbre. Herewith the artist unites an agreeable, truly artistic interpretation which will always assure her great success. She sang first a Romanza from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," extraordinarily well suited to her voice—an excellent rendition, deserving of the highest praise. Still a greater impression was made by the German song "From Out Thine Eyes." Ries sang with feeling also the Barcarolla. Guglielmo met with immediate response and great applause.—St. Louis Republic.

Marie Kern-Mullen is artistic and soulful in her interpretations. She sang an aria from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens), the "Love, Lend Me Thy Might," the second number "Little Boy Blue" (Joyce), a very caressing little song and a decided contrast to the first number. Her interpretations are dramatic and she possesses a charming personality. The duet numbers by Sophia Stephali and Marie Kern-Mullen were interesting. The two deep, rich voices blend splendidly in the "Hear Me, Norma," from the opera "Norma" (Bellini). By special request several folk songs were given, a "Gypsy Love Song" and Tuscan and Italian Folk Songs.—Sioux Falls Press.

Marie Kern-Mullen in costume sang the recitative and aria "Amour Viens Aider," from Saint-Saens' "Samson et Dalila," and proved herself a capable actress as well as a charming vocalist. She followed with an old English song, "When Love Is Kind," and Joyce's "Little Boy Blue."—Vancouver (B. C.) Daily Province.

Chicago Critics Merciful Compared With Those of Paris

Criticizing the critic is one of the favorite sports of the professionals and the laity. Contumely, disdain, opprobrium, hatred, anger, contempt, scorn and a few other human passions and emotions are the harvest the conscientious critic reaps as he humbly sows his rocky field of honest endeavor.

The public's attitude toward the critic is one of defensive dislike and distrust. The average reader believes that the critic seeks the columns of his journal solely for the purpose of the display of his own wit and cleverness. The professional thinks the critic truly great only when he reads praise of his talents or his efforts to be talented in the printed lines. The artist vows eternal gratitude to the reviewer one day when his "notice" is good, and calls the wrath of the gods down upon his head the next if the criticism is less laudatory, no matter how merited.

Many of our local critics have been censored privately and publicly for the frank expression of their opinions. Their task of telling what they believe to be the truth, in the interest of Art with a capital letter and for the benefit and edification of the public, is a job rendered well-nigh priceless by the difficulties placed in their way of sincerity.

It is different abroad. In France, editors pay their critics not only to tell the truth but to tell it cleverly, brilliantly, wittily, if they can. Thus they justify the pecuniary outlay and stimulate the taste of patrons of art, for a scintillating criticism is the spice and vinegar that flavors art-life of today. Nobody likes a wit as well as the French, I think.

Here are a few examples of the type of satire permitted to flourish in the French capital:

Dethurens, baritone, sings Valentine in "Faust" one evening. The next day a critic writes: "What joy was ours last night when Faust killed Valentine! But what a pity he did not die before the performance!"

This is the way Arnold Mortier of the Figaro reported the performance of Roberto Stagno at the Grand Opera in a performance of Meyerbeer's "Africaine." For days the name of Stagno had been featured in immense letters before the opera house.

Mortier's opinion was expressed thus:

Last night I heard
"The Great Stagno."
During the first act I heard
"The Great Stagno."
During the second act I heard
"The Great Stagno."
During the third act I heard
"The Great Stagno."
During the fourth act I heard
"The Great Stagno."

What He Should Do.—The well-known Chevalier is singing Raoul in "The Huguenots." His role holds this line, uttered while Valentine faints at his feet: "What shall I do? What shall I do?" The next day the critic of the Moniteur obligingly offers this solution: "What shall you do? Pack up!"

Blanche Dabelli has an aria in "Ambassadrice" (the "Ambassadress") which begins with this phrase: "I sing well when he is nigh." Paul Duprat, critic of the Nouvelliste, comments thus: "The next time you sing, Mademoiselle, be sure he is there; for he certainly must have been absent last night."

Julia Hisson makes her debut at the opera in Marguerite of "Faust." Albert Jouvin's appreciation of the lady, in the Figaro next day, was: "We were promised a star. What we got was a mere rushlight."

Of course these very free translations rob the lines of most of their savor and sharpness. But the sting is there.

You can see that, compared to those unflattering reviewers, critics of Chicago are angels!

They used to say that Mlle. Merguillier of the Opera Comique in Paris said a special prayer every time she had to sing a new role, knowing, therefore, that all the critics would be there: "Dear Lord, give all the critics a perfect digestion, if only for tonight!"

Popular opinion has it that a critic's writings are affected by his stomach or liver. Judging from the appetites and choice of comestibles of some of our local judges of art, I should say that this malady is not current in Chicago.—Herman Devries in Chicago American.

Paderewski Quits Music to Serve New Polish State

As a pianist Jan Ignace Paderewski never will thrill his thousands of American friends and admirers again.

He has given up music, according to Constantin Radkiewicz, Polish financier, who is in New York to obtain American loans for his country.

"I said good-by to Premier Paderewski less than four weeks ago," said Radkiewicz. "He is not the man that America knew and loved. With his new responsibilities, which he is discharging so well, he has not the time nor inclination to think of music. He told me he never would play in public again."—Chicago Tribune.

Florence Easton in Philadelphia With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Following her successful appearances in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Florence Easton went to Philadelphia with this organization and won additional acclaim.

Madame Easton has already won her loyal public here by her admirable work as an opera singer, and her rare gifts were all in evidence last evening. A certain radiant, buoyant freshness of presence in red-flowered white satin gave itself with aptness to the lovely lyricism of Mozart. Madame Easton is a singer who rests her appeal on the straightforward technics and not the artificial strategics of her metier. She knows how to sing, and so she does not have to display meretricious bravure.—The Morning Public Ledger, Philadelphia, November 5.

The solosist for the evening was that excellent artist and gifted soprano singer, Mme. Florence Easton, who is so well and favorably known to the opera and concert goers of this city, and whose fine voice and cultivated methods were advantageously displayed in an authoritative delivery of the "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and of Lia's aria in Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."—The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 5.

There was evidently much pleasure on the part of the audience in welcoming Miss Easton, whose appearances here in opera have established her as a favorite. Her clear, sympathetic soprano, of unusual beauty in quality and in its power of dramatic expression, was heard in a recitative and the "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the recitative and aria of Lia, from "L'Enfant Prodigue," Debussy, the latter disclosing her decidedly to the best advantage.—The Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, November 5.

Mascagni Looks for Great Music Now Shaping in Ragtime and Popular Airs

Rome, June 16 (Correspondence of the Associated Press).—Pietro Mascagni, the composer, expects a great American opera to be produced by an American composer, with an American theme, which shall crystallize America's musical attainments. This work, he said, was shaping itself in the efforts America was now making in her music halls and conservatories.

"I am looking forward with some amount of anxiety to the production of a great musical work in America in the near future," said Signor Mascagni. "There will certainly be produced soon a great American musical composition. I believe it will reflect the life of America.

"I feel that it will be built up out of the music of America, music which is so popular there. The strains which take the popular ear will repeat themselves in this new work I am expecting. It will be the expression of America in all her social, economic and artistic life, and will be another step and another contribution to the great musical productions.

"It will symbolize America, just as Russian music symbolizes Russia and Italian Italy.

"The music of the negroes is so entrancing," said the maestro. "I like to hear it so much. I think it, too, will have its part in the musical achievements of America."

Ragtime, he said, would also have its great part in American productions.—New York Sun.

Press Comment on the Work of Ethel Edith Jones

The second night of a decidedly successful May Festival introduced Miss Jones, the popular Chicago singer, who gave a recital and sang the contralto role in the oratorio, "Ruth," with orchestra and chorus of one hundred voices. Miss Jones more than met the expectations of her audience. Her voice is a wonderfully rich contralto, with a power of expression and a clear purity of tone which are entirely satisfying. She sang the "Japanese Death Song," by Sharp, in a way that left her audience reluctant to break the spell by applause. The "Dutch Serenade" and "The Year's at the Spring" were given with equal beauty. "Land of Hope and Glory," by Elgar, was sung as patriotic songs should be sung—from the heart.—Witness, Platteville, Wis.

Miss Jones was heard with keen enthusiasm in an inspiring program in which her ability was clearly demonstrated. The wide range of her wonderful voice was artistically displayed, and she has a charming stage presence.—Conservative, Independence, Iowa.

Miss Jones is the possessor of an unusually beautiful voice of mezzo quality, and is a thorough artist in her interpretation and technic.—Gazette, Waukegan, Ill.

A mezzo-soprano voice of splendid quality. Since last heard in Davenport her voice has developed to a remarkable degree.—Democrat, Davenport, Iowa.

Some Comment on the Piano Playing of Clarice Balas

She played Beethoven, Liszt and Chopin, and showed that she is not only a follower of Leschetizky in technic, but also in spirit. The "Moonlight Sonata" was enveloped with a poetic light and afforded a glance into the soul of the German master; in the Chopin nocturne all the characteristics of the French

Slav of soulful melancholy were plastically unfolded, and in the Liszt rhapsody sparkled the fire and originality and daring power of invention of the great Hungarian. Of her yesterday's debut she may say: "I came, was seen and heard—and conquered!"—M. H.

As soon as the young pianist struck the first chord we knew we were sure to enjoy an artistic treat. We judge from Miss Bala's yesterday's playing that a new star has appeared for us on the musical horizon, and foretells a bright future for this young talented pianist—M. Notna, in American, December 11, 1912.

The Tuesday concert of the young Bohemian pianist at the Statler Hotel was a rare artistic treat.—M., in Delnicke Listy, December 11, 1912.

Miss Balas opened the program with that giant work, Bach-Liszt, which showed her power and strength, and her brilliant command of piano technic. Three Liszt numbers formed her last group, which called forth the warmest applause of the afternoon.—Town Topics.

Harold Henry With the Chicago Symphony Orchestra

When Mr. Henry played with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra last year he was the subject of a great deal of newspaper comment, a few lines from some of the articles being here reproduced:

MacDowell's second concerto is, among other things, exacting far beyond the common; it is tricky and it presents a task of preparation for everybody taking part. It is, fortunately for Mr. Henry and for the MacDowell propaganda, something more, it is a good concerto, both of itself and as a showpiece for capable pianists; and it is good music, with definite and abundant melody. Mr. Henry was the most successful where least was expected—in the writing which called for virility and positive definition. The refinement of his playing and the good taste and cleanliness of his style were as always outstanding matters.—Chicago Tribune.

Harold Henry gave a broad reading of the MacDowell concerto in D minor. He had the feeling for the music, not only in the big sweep of it, but also in its graceful passages with their play of lights and shades.—Chicago Evening Post.

Young America is asserting itself musically more and more every day. Harold Henry, the pianist, has forged ahead into the front rank of pianists, and his selection of the second of the MacDowell concertos was evidently due to its more characteristic American themes and development. Mr. Henry played it with keen understanding of its musical import, with great fervor and sparkle, and with dazzling technical brilliance.—Chicago Daily News.

It was nothing short of captivating. This is a style of music at which Henry is an expert. It had light, color and personality.—Chicago Journal.

His interpretation was intelligent, well rounded, sane and interesting.—Chicago Examiner.

"The Elixir of Love"

"The Elixir of Love" is one of two comic operas by Donizetti that survive in the standard repertoire. This one may be made equally to serve the purposes and the prides of a tenor or a coloratura soprano. The other comic piece, "Don Pasquale," depends wholly upon the wishes of the coloratura—the type of voice for which Donizetti did most of his writing. He composed in all sixty-seven operas, "grand" and comic, and the operagoer of this day knows not more than four or five of them. Two, "Lucia" and "Linda," are in Galli-Curci's repertoire; a third, "Don Pasquale," she is adding to her list; and then there is "The Elixir," with which Miss Garrison, herself a distinguished Lucia, is to be teamed with Caruso.

The lure for the tenors in "The Elixir" is, of course, the familiar aria of "Una furtiva lagrima," which was the big item in Caruso's list when he sang last May in the Medinah Temple, and is also in John McCormack's inventory of old Italian compositions. This aria goes, in the Ravinia restoration of the opera, to Orville Harrold, who is to be one of Caruso's associates (and rivals) in the coming season of the Metropolitan. Any Italian tenor will cheerfully confess that he regards "Una furtiva lagrima" as a greater aria than any other in the Italian opera, not excepting "Celeste Aida."

Another item about "The Elixir of Love" is that it provided Gilbert and Sullivan with their first inspiration. Their earliest full length operetta, "The Sorcerer," was designed as a travesty on Donizetti's piece. "The Sorcerer" is not among the Gilbert and Sullivan works most familiar to American audiences, although Chicago was the scene of its most recent revival. De Wolf Hopper opened his engagement with "The Sorcerer" when he last sang here in the Gilbert and Sullivan repertoire, in January and February of 1915. Making fun of the old Italian operas was the breath of life to both Gilbert, the comic poet and plot writer, and Sullivan, who knew music as a medium for comedy, and "The Sorcerer" traces, in book and score, to "The Elixir" just as "Pinafore" traces to "Il Trovatore."—Chicago Tribune.

"Dee-he-ep River" Holds Bait for Many Poor Musical Fish Who Forget What Ravinia Offers

Young persons who fall victims to the disease known as Taking Vocal are queer creatures. They come here by the thousands from all parts of the country to be told at ten dollars a throe (yes, throe) to sing LA la instead of a la LA, and not under any circumstances to breathe while crossing "Dee-He-ep River," no matter how prolonged the agony.

They do all this with gleeful enthusiasm, throwing away father's shekels and their own brave energy with a youthful abandon worthy of better results.

And yet right before them, or at best but a short, cool car ride to the north of them, they could, in a pleasant two hours at Ravinia Park, hear more about the art of singing than they imbibe in many a superfluous lesson.

That is, they could get all this if they went at all and, having arrived, would listen with open ears. But they don't go. At least not in sufficient numbers to be evident in the fashionable audiences that gather there nightly to applaud some of the best artists in Mr. Gatti-Casazza's astutely chosen Metropolitan list.

This thought came to mind again Saturday, when in the last two acts of "Tosca" Florence Easton, Kingston and Rothier gave an exhibition of fine singing that at Ravinia prices is a bargain, beating the July shoe sales all to pieces.—Henriette Weber in Herald and Examiner.

Successful Song for Recital and Home

'O Little Mother of Mine'

BY GEORGE B. NEVIN

The list of songs of this character continues to lengthen. The subject is a most worthy one and has attracted the attention of many of our leading composers. To be truly successful, songs of this class must contain fine wholesome sentiment and charming melody. The stamp of public approval would certainly attest that Mr. Nevin has the God given gift of melody, and with the following tender words, so full of deep emotion, we at once have a song worthy of attention for either recital or home use.:

"Sometimes in the hush of the evening hours,
When the shadows creep from the west
I think of the twilight songs you sang
And the boy you loved the best.
The wee little boy with the tousled head
That so long ago was thine,
I wonder if ever you think of your boy,
O little mother of mine!"

This song is issued by the Oliver Ditson Company for high and low voices and as a chorus for mixed voices, and has in truth gone to the ends of the earth. Recently a program on which it appeared was sent the publishers from Aukland, New Zealand, and it has touched the soldier's heart in far off Alsace.

Already sung by Joseph Del Puente, son of the great baritone; Frank Croxton, the New York basso, who has also made a record of it; the eminent contralto, Lillian Stradling, at the Saco Valley, Maine, Festival; Mrs. Lamson at the Tremont Street Temple, Boston; J. Ellsworth Sliker, soldier, singer and teacher; J. Preston Smith; Paul Default, on his Australian tour, and many others, and by schools, choral societies and churches, it stands out as one of the best mother songs yet produced.

IMPRESSIONS OF A MUSICIAN IN FRANCE

By JOSEF KONECNY

Brest, France, June 8, 1919.

We have just completed our third week in Brest and will probably stay here two or three more. We left Paris Sunday evening, May 18. It is an all-night run from Paris to Brest and naturally there are no Pullman sleepers. Instead, if the compartment is not crowded, one simply pulls out the seats, which are so made as to permit of their being arranged into a sort of couch, and sleeps on that. It is not at all bad. Certainly our hearts went out to the soldiers, train loads of whom we passed, crowded in these small European box cars like horses or cattle. Compared with theirs, our lot was luxurious, to say the least.

The night was decidedly cool, and we arrived at Brest thoroughly chilled. However, the authorities here have a better system than at Paris, for we were immediately taken in charge, conducted to headquarters and made to feel at home. We played that same night and have been kept busy ever since.

The two ladies were temporarily placed in the Hotel au "Cheval Blanc" (Hotel of the White Horse), and, as usual, I had to strike out for myself and found a room at the "Hotel de l'Esperance" (Hotel Hope). Yes, this name was very apropos, for it made one hope for better things.

Situated on a narrow street, the hotel entrance looked forbidding enough, but the interior resembled a gloomy dungeon more than anything else. And my room! Not even a kerosene lamp, but a candle for a light, and this I had to furnish myself! It was a narrow bedroom, with wooden bed, one very small table and one chair and a dresser, and everything, including the walls, dilapidated. For this they had the brazenness to charge six francs a day! Brest, just like Paris and every other place occupied by Americans in France, is fearfully overcrowded, with the result that prices are high and accommodations poor. I stayed in this place two days and then took refuge in the Y. M. C. A. rooming house, or "Hotel Meuble," where I was fortunate enough to secure a tiny attic bedroom on the sixth floor, just barely large enough to turn around in, and with a dormer window about two feet by sixteen inches for light and air. But I had an electric light and the place was at least clean. I stayed here a week until I was able to get located at the Continental Hotel, probably the best in town, where the ladies had already been fortunate enough to secure accommodations some time earlier.

The American military camp at Brest is now perhaps one of the best in France. If, some months ago, it was criticized, surely that criticism does not hold good now. There are on an average about 80,000 troops here on their way back to the States. I don't suppose I am revealing any military secrets by making this statement now. Naturally such a large body of men needs a great deal of healthy amusement and distraction. There are perhaps fifty or more "Y" huts, K. of C., and Red Cross huts, so that it takes the various musical and other entertainment units between five and six weeks to play the circuit. The entertainment, just like everything else, is conducted on a systematic basis. Each military base or region has its booking office or Y. M. C. A. entertainment department co-operating with the military authorities. Every attraction is booked a week in advance. Each afternoon or evening, as the case may be, the auto calls for the various entertainers' units at their hotels, takes them out to the place where they are to perform and back again. This is repeated systematically day after day.

The conditions under which we perform are the most strenuous, to say the least. A "Y" or K. of C. hut, or any other "hut," for that matter, is the poorest sort of a place, acoustically speaking, to perform in. They are all of wood, low and with rafters. Your audience will range anywhere from one or two hundred to a thousand or more, jammed in so thickly that they can't move, occupying part of the stage and sitting even on the window sills. Tobacco smoke fills the air. The air is warm and thick and humid. Your audience is composed of men from every walk of life. Some of them have never heard a musical recital before and don't even know the meaning of the word. Others again have heard and seen the best. But all of them are very anxious to be through with their work here and get back home. A baseball game may be in full swing outside, with hundreds of soldier fans cheering themselves hoarse while you are trying to bring the very best tones from your violin. A gasoline engine operating a delousing plant may be puffing outside right under the very windows in rhythm with the music. During one of our concerts a heavy thunderstorm broke loose and a lot of the boys had to pile out right in the middle of one of my numbers to hold down their tents and prevent them from blowing away. Soldier audiences at best are restless, anyway, and no matter what sort of program is being played there will always be some continually coming and going. During one of Miss Browne's songs a colored boy sitting on the window sill fell out backward. Of course, everybody in the audience looked around to see what the commotion was about. As he fell only a few feet no harm was done, but how Miss Browne managed to keep a straight and serious face nobody knows. And the pianos! Ye gods and little fishes! This is the saddest part of all. Almost all of them are of French and English make. They are small, and I am free to say that the poorest of American makes are superior to the kind we are using here. All of them are fearfully out of tune. Invariably they are anywhere from half a tone to a tone below international pitch. One instrument we had the other day was positively unique. As is usually the case, we had no chance to try it out beforehand, and when Miss Tris, the pianist, struck the first chord the effect was most wonderful and weird and more bizarre than the most rabidly ultra-modern harmonies that are being employed by some contemporary futurist composers. The middle register was fully a tone lower in corresponding pitch than either the lower and upper, and no two tones individually in tune! How we ever managed it I don't know, but we pulled through somehow. Very often some of the ivories are gone. A week or so ago while we had such a piano I played a Bohemian dance containing a number of long glissandi passages for the piano. The result was that Miss Tris had a badly skinned finger at the finish, and we have had to discontinue using this number.

It speaks eloquently for Miss Tris, our pianist, that day after day, in spite of these conditions, she is able to play the Chopin Military Polonaise and similar numbers.

These are just a few of the obstacles that confront the artist. Yet in spite of it all we are giving a recital program, entirely musical, without the intrusion of a reader such as invariably characterizes the vast majority of so-called "concerts" that are being given for the soldiers. It is probably the only one of its kind that is being given or has been given. Having myself served as a "buck private" I know from personal experience how trashy most of the music is that is constantly being ground out in camp on phonographs, piano players, and most of the entertainers sent to the camps. I made up my mind, therefore, to make war upon "tin pan alley" music to the very hilt and give the men only the very best.

Of course owing to the hard physical condition and the natural restlessness of the men, we must confine ourselves to the shorter and more brilliant classics. On various occasions I have played the three movements of the D Minor Concerto of Vieuxtemps and the Romance and Allegro Zingara from the Wieniawski Concerto. Ordinarily, however, I confine myself to the St. Lubin-Donizetti "Lucia" Fantasy for violin alone, "Romance" of Wieniawski, "Gypsy Dance" of Nachez, and similar numbers, which, though short, yet combine brilliancy and the very best musical standards.

Almost invariably after each concert we are approached by soldiers who express their appreciation at being treated to real music, and their disgust at the constant "jazz" and ragtime that is being dished out to them.

As I said before, the army consists of men from all walks of life, including college men, engineers and others with technical training. They are, you might say, the backbone of the army. Though good music is appreciated by everybody, it is this class of men that we reach in particular and who are far too often left out of the reckoning.

And is there anything better calculated to raise the morale of our men than the inspired and glorious musical masterpieces? Will "tin-pan alley" music (?), combined with high kicking and extremely decollete and short feminine gowns, raise the morale of the soldier? God knows that if ever the soldiers needed morale and esprit de corps they need it now. This is particularly true of the soldiers that we meet here who have been in Germany with the army of occupation and who are now on their way home. You have all heard and read that the Germans, with characteristic Teutonic shrewdness, made it a point to treat the Americans particularly well. It was and is nothing more nor less than German propaganda of a most practical and deadly sort, and the American doughboy has swallowed the bait, hook, sinker and all.

The city of Brest is ugly to say the least, and dirty. It is perhaps the poorest of French cities in point of attractiveness and cleanliness. If this is true of Brest, it certainly is not true of the surrounding country. The "Y" conducts daily motor truck trips to various points of historic interest. These journeys usually cover 60 to 75 miles. I shall not try and describe the beautiful scenery, charming roads, houses, fields, and interesting legends connected with the old shrines and churches, but shall attempt to do so in another letter.

BRIEF ITEMS FROM FRANCE

Paris

A new opera by Alfred Bruneau, composer of "L'Attaque du Moulin," will be given at the Opera Comique in the early fall. "Nais," the new opera, will be created by Monsieur Vigneau. The Opera Comique will revive "The Two Blinds" and "Marriage With Canterus," by Jacques Offenbach, composer of the "Tales of Hoffman." The Opera revived a fifteen-year-old opera, "Helene," by Camille Saint-Saens. It was interpreted by Mademoiselles Marcelle Demougeot, Bugg, Royer and Mr. Franz. Camille Chevillard conducted. The Opera Comique placed on the boards "La Fille de Mme. Angot," with Mademoiselles Favart, Merentie, Bourguignon, and Messrs. Tillard and Allard.

Charles Fontaine Rejoins the Opera Comique

The admirable tenor, who so successfully interpreted "Des Grieux" at the performances of the Chicago Opera Association, rejoined the opera of Rue Favart and created a superb impression in the same role. He was assisted by Mme. Carre, who sang Manon. This was the thousandth performance at the Opera Comique of Massenet's work. The orchestra was under the leadership of Monsieur Hesse.

The Spanish Theatre at the Cort

Whenever a reviewer attempts to criticize radically (and let us say an unbiased criticism) he is bound to be characterized as prejudiced. All that the dictionaries contain in terms of opprobrium is applied to us. Because of our sincere expressions the critics of the critics finally recur to the term "ignorance." I went to the Spanish Theatre, which was recently repatched from a financial fiasco, and expected no artistic entertainment; but my expectations during the performance decreased.

An operetta called "The Old Lady," containing some agreeable tunes, was given with voiceless voices. The names of the interpreters are unnecessary because of the mediocre work. The operetta was followed by a revue, "Three Dreams." It is pretty hard to compete with Ziegfeld Follies, though a decent Spanish revue would surpass in quality our own revues. Only one dancer proved efficient for this sort of entertainment. Revues require good-looking girls, neat costumes and fair singing voices. The latter were not absent, but the first two were.

Spanish folk songs, dances and operettas are very agreeable, but they must justify their presentation. We hope that the Spanish company will be improved, as it is inexorable to their own existence.

THEATRES

"39 East" at the Maxine Elliott

Rachel Crothers, author of "The Little Journey," turns the wheel around a girl who can be good and square with herself in a world of complicated matters. That's the theme which this author expounds, but the play ends always with a marriage. Surely the conclusion is inconsistent with Miss Crothers' theory. The play as a whole is amusing, especially in the first act when the inmates of a boarding house find time to discuss the world in spite of their imperfect minds.

George M. Cohan knows how to dwell on our typical boarding houses, but Crothers devotes too much attention to the "high-brow" class. The theme is an old one, and with the authors the matter of problems and solutions is a thing that concerns them little. Here and there they throw in some emotional phrases, so that the public is caught in a net, and when this happens the audiences are ready to pronounce "39 East" a play with morals. Well, there is no moral to this comedy, and Miss Crothers may have realized it. But did she intend to write one with a moral or a solution?

Constance Binney was charming as the young heroine. She acted naturally and often made us believe that she was a sincere believer in the play. She was ably supported by Sidney Blackmer. The Shuberts are the producers.

AT THE WHITNEY TEW STUDIOS

Seasons may wax and wane and the advent of hot summer afternoons suppress most of the musical activities pertaining to that time during the winter and spring months, but at the Whitney Tew Studios in the Fine Arts Building there is no account taken—evidently, of times or season.

For—on last Sunday afternoon there was the usual big attendance at the monthly musicale—the same fine program and the usual enthusiastic response on the part of the audience.

A WHITNEY TEW GROUP
Mr. Tew, Roxan D'Oex, Winnifred Cline and Harriet Cartwright

One has grown so accustomed to the "long range" of Tew pupils that it is now taken for granted in every case and—after hearing Mr. Tew's elucidative remarks at one of these occasions the audience settles down to listening to the music itself, and in the enjoyment invariably afforded finds ample confirmation of his methods.

Miss Cartwright at the piano is a tower of strength—for she has splendid musicianship as well as fine pianistic development, and Miss Levy, too, adds, as alternate accompanist, an agreeably artistic touch.

Mr. Tew is the very soul of cordiality and he has a way of making his pupils feel very much at home in his splendid studios, and therefore there is, invariably—at his Sunday musicales, a feeling of repose and comfort as well as a definitely artistic influence.

As usual, in the reviewing of one of these events we are confronted with the physical impossibility of detailing the work of all the singers, and must, perforce—be content with a brief comment or two and the printing of the fine program.

The piano solo of Miss Cunningham (a niece of Miss Cartwright) was very neat and definite.

Mme. Melius disclosed the fact of constant growth and a thoroughly artistic impulse.

Miss Cline showed a remarkable range, even on the Tew ruler, and not only gave some very low tones good body, but in the high C, taken at the close of her group, emitted a tone at once ringing and beautiful.

Mrs. Alcott, definite artist pupil and very evidently fully conversant with the Tew requirements and possibilities, again showed lovely tone and brilliant style.

Mr. Jaeger, a well-known professional from St. Paul, disclosed the fact of nice, resonant quality and an enunciation which glorified the Mendelssohn text.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF NORMAL METHODS—Western Session, 1919

Friday, July 18, marked the close of a very successful institute, held at Northwestern University under the auspices of the Silver Burdette Company, publishers of books for public school singing.

The commencement exercises on Friday evening consisted of numbers by the A. I. N. M. Orchestra and by the chorus. Mr. Osbourne McConathy presented diplomas to those who had done the required work for three sessions of the institute.

A feature of the commencement week was the presentation of "The Frog Prince," a delightful children's operetta by William Lester, well known to Chicago as an accompanist-coach and composer. The operetta is based in part on Mother Goose rhymes, with their traditional melodies, while the story is taken from Grimm and has to do with the princess who lost the royal golden orb down the well. The score is simplicity itself, but there is a quaintness present in the harmonies which is very effective. Mr. Lester accompanied in person.

Costumes for the operetta were designed by the art department of the school, as were the posters used announcing the event.

The operetta being short, the first part of the evening's program afforded a generous selection of songs and arias by Mr. and Mrs. McElroy Johnston.

This concert was of great interest, as were also the recitals which occurred on various evenings during the institute session. These were reviewed in previous issues of Music News, excepting the orchestra concert which occurred on the night before commencement. The orchestra, under Russell V. Morgan, consisted of talented members of the institute, who proved that public school music teachers are likely to have a surprising knowledge of instrumental music in addition to their professed branches.

The campus at Northwestern is an ideal place for a summer institute, situated on Lake Michigan in a beautiful section of Evanston. Classes occupy the greater part of the day, however, so that the girls scarcely have time to enjoy the opportunities for sports to the extent that they should. Competent instructors are brought to the session from all over the country and a high standard of work insisted upon.

Dr. Seashore, Peter C. Lutkin (music director), and Dr. Protheroe are among the lecturers afforded.

"Do re mi" Theory Exploded

By EFFA ELLIS PERFIELD

Reprinted by Request of Many Subscribers (All rights reserved)

Using the "sol fa" syllables is unpedagogical. Such use violates a fundamental principle of education. It is equivalent to teaching one thing in order to teach another. This is bad pedagogy.

The syllable names are meant to be guides or aids. A guide, in order to be of service, must be a stepping stone and assistance to the thing that is to be developed.

A guide must not be more difficult to learn, or be brought more to the foreground, than the thing it is to lead up to and aid in establishing. One thing should not be used as a guide in developing another unless the thing so used is itself of value. Two or more distinct things may be taught at the same time, each reacting and re-enforcing the other. For instance, note values may be taught in connection with rhythm, balance, phrasing, sequence, melodic progressions and tonality. Each of the above may be emphasized and strengthened because of its association with one or more of the others. But in the case of the "sol fa" syllables, as a means of singing the tones which they name, we find them difficult and burdensome to apply.

The "sol fa" syllables are articulate sounds. Tones are inarticulate sounds. To use an articulate sound for the sake of expressing or recognizing an inarticulate sound is to master a more difficult sound in order to express the simplest of all sounds—tones. Furthermore, the "sol fa" syllables have no value for themselves alone. At best they are only means to an end. None of the most ardent advocates of the use of the "sol fa" syllables claims more than this for them—"means to an end." Here is an instance in which the "means" do not work toward the "end," but actually and positively thwart that end—facile and free expression. How can conscious thinking in articulate names simplify and facilitate natural and free expression in inarticulate sounds?

We ask the skilled singer of "do re mi" to test the following exercises, then tell us which is the easier to sing, the bugle tones with or without the syllables.

Exercise: Sing "loo" to any lively bugle call you may know or improvise. Repeat and apply the "do mi sol" correctly to the same tones. What is the result? The mind and tongue did not respond rapidly enough to connect the syllables with the tones. The bugle with its flowing chord tones is easily sung. More feeling can be expressed without the syllables because only tone is heard—there are no syllables to occupy the mind and detract from the music. Really and earnestly we must say with all the sincerity we can command that it is incumbent upon the advocate of the "sol fa" system to answer and refute this use of the articulate and conscious in facilitating the inarticulate subconscious expression.

Often the principle of the articulate sounds, "sol fa" syllables, is used when the names are not used at all. This is possible even though the singer did not know the "sol fa" syllables and how to apply them. This is the case in all instances where the beginner's training is based on tones considered as interval distances, and as individual problems that must be mastered through, or by reason of, the beginner's ability to recall the successive tones of a melody as tones of the scale previously memorized. In instances of this kind the mental effort and the quality of effort are the same, or practically the same, as though the syllable names were used. Consequently to merely eliminate the "sol fa" syllables and still rely on the scale and interval system does not bring us into the feeling for tones as they lie in melody and harmony, and without this feeling there can be no real musical stimulus, and without musical stimulus there can be no natural and accurate recalling of tones. The basis of all correct singing, either sight singing, singing from memory, or singing by imitation, or part singing is the feeling for a progression of tones growing out of the fundamental tone of the chords. All musical capacity is based on this fundamental feeling.

The individual experienced in the feeling for tones in chords and in the feeling for chord progressions is equipped to master any problem of pitch relations and to master it musically. Thus equipped, in singing the tones of the melody, each succeeding tone is sure to come into the mind as the result of the stimulus of the tones already sung. The two distinct elements of stimulus for singing tones of a melody are: key feeling through chords, and feeling for the tonal order of the particular composition.

Is it not apparent that training the immature mind to think of a tone through associating it with an individual name trains the beginner to depend upon the name association as a mental suggestion rather than upon the musical factors of chord feeling and melody feeling? In one case the association is purely mental, to develop later into musical feeling—a dual and indirect process. In the other case the association is entirely musical from the beginning—a single process of feeling—direct, immediate and responsive.

Why use "do re mi" names for a thing which the singer can best learn and do by the true feeling of tones? Would it not seem that it is only cumbering and overburdening the student with methods and processes which have no value of themselves—which make simple processes difficult and which, if used after these processes are fully established, only add elaboration and additional material to processes which are more simple without?

Why master the simple through the complex?

Why reach the obvious through the complicated?

Why reach the immediate through the remote?

Why use the obscure for the distinct?

Why use the unpleasant for the agreeable?

Why reach the harmonious through the inharmonious?

Using syllable names is unpedagogical. It is unpedagogical because—

The guide is more burdensome than the thing it teaches.

The guide requires more thought than the thing it teaches;

The guide itself is of no value.

The guide is not fundamental because it is not final.

The guide is based on reasoning instead of feeling.

The guide is uninteresting.

The guide lacks clearness and is too easily misused.

The guide lacks definiteness.

The guide is insecure.

The guide requires too much drill.

Instead of learning to sing names for music, let us spend our time singing music. Let us eliminate in the beginning all that must be thrown aside at the end. All music study should begin and end with music.

"Independence, Our Country's Dream," is the rather commonplace title of a song which is very far indeed from being commonplace in its musical and patriotic content.

Both the words and music are by A. W. Van Dorsten of Chicago and in both lines of effort he has proven his unusual ability.

The text glows with patriotic feeling and is smooth in flow and convincing in sentiment.

The music fits the words exactly and is not only easily singable, but is, furthermore, decidedly logical and artistic.

The song has been used in many notable meetings already, and it is safe to predict that it will find much immediate use, and that it will take its ready place in the established repertoire.

COMMENTS ON BOOKS

A Child's Day in Song, A Child's Night in Song, by Mana-Zucca. (Publisher: G. Schirmer, New York.)

A nation which sings is one that never perishes. Songs to a child or an adult are just as important as the everyday necessities. The spirit of a nation lies deeply in its singing. Whether of a gay nature or serious, they depict our moods. We have taught and are teaching our children national hymns, which is nothing but a duty. Excepting these tunes, our children are given only meager opportunities to sing. That we do not make music an obligation is a matter of regret. To cultivate the love of music you must begin with the child; to imbue the love of singing into a nation you must begin early. Our children grow up with ragtime and with no inclination for the proper song. But we are a young nation and we hope that the musical evolution will more and more be felt.

Mana-Zucca loves the kiddies, and therefore she composes for them. A collection of sixteen or more songs is published in two very neat volumes. They contain sweet, facile and charming melodies. Every child should be given these songs. They deserve to be placed in every child's vocal repertoire. The verses, by Mabel Livingston Frank, are most effectively wedded to the Mana-Zucca tunes. In fact, the verses are singable words in themselves. There are several neat drawings and the whole arrangement is artistic.

Lena Wheeler Chambers, who for four seasons has had charge of the piano department of the Effa Ellis Perfield Summer School, is again awakening the interest of the assembled teachers by the presentation of her principles to be applied to teaching and playing the piano.

Mrs. Chambers is the author of the book—"Constructive and Interpretative Technic"—wherein she proves her statement that in order to lay the foundation for artistic and dramatic interpretation, technic must be wedded to tone-color and accentuation from the very first. This union she secures by means of previous knowledge, the "Reasoning Story," also illustrations drawn from the spoken language and poetry, the laws pertaining to the last two, forming the foundation upon which music is largely built; for as one studies the pronunciation, enunciation, and inflection of a word, so too, one must comprehend the meaning, expression, and delivery of each tone, not only of the melody, but also of the accompaniment.

Mrs. Chambers thinks that far too many teachers and players depend upon feeling and natural tendencies for accentuation and shading, thereby so often using wrong pronunciation, inflection, and dynamics, that the interpretation seems more of a caricature than a characterization. And because little attention has been paid to this subject, the general public is not discriminating—hence pleased with what it hears, little realizing what it is missing.

However, perfect accuracy of technic is easily possible, according to Mrs. Chambers' system of reasoning relative to accentuation, modified by the demands of pulse, climax of both motive and phrase, etc., and to illustrate the idea of climax she uses the following clever little story: A lady out walking met a little girl to whom she said, "Where are you going Mary?" "I've already been where I am going," was the quick reply; the application being that in making a climax, one should not only know and feel where he is going, but cause the listener to "foreknow" and realize the same.

SURPRISE GIFT FOR STURKOW-RYDER

Theodora Sturkow-Ryder has passed the four hundred mark in making records for the Q. R. S. Company, besides writing and editing the story rolls, which made a sensation on their issuance. Last week a novel surprise party was given the popular pianist by artists whom she has presented at the Hippodrome from time to time. A fine black leather traveling case with trimmings, a clock, etc., was the gift, and Mme. Jane English, who sang this week at the Great Northern, introducing a Sturkow-Ryder song, wrote a poem puzzle in which she incorporated all the names of the donors, who included Carl Craven, Mme. Carra Greene, Mattylee Lippard, Lillian Parks, May Norton, Rollin Pease, Mrs. Mills, Aeolian Trio, Lorraine Earnest, Nellie Gordon, Mme. English, Mme. Hathaway, Mme. Arendt, Miss Rodiger, and Dorothea North.

The poem follows:

To a lady with gold hair,
Of both charming and piquant air,
Our manager fair,

SALUTE

1, 2, 3

And now you must guess the riddle,—
Three of us play the fiddle.
The first can take up the bow
And play something earnest and slow.
The second can play surprisingly low.

Of the other fiddler I would say:
"That third one certainly hath a way."

When her sonorous voice pours forth
One thinks of the stately songs of the north.

One lady would leave a pneumonia bed
Or, if need be, stand on her pretty head
To sing when the contract said.

A heroic tenor with hair like a raven,
Whose name rhyming with this is ———.

A young blond lady who loves to be
Your faithful, honorable secretary (very difficult).

A contralto, tall and statuesque,
Who sits afternoons at the Rundell desk.

A baritone, who, sly as a fox,
Tried to give you a dose of smallpox.

10

An aeolian harp with three strings,
And when the zepher over them sings,
Their melody in one's memory clings.

11

The tallest man you succeeded to book,
With a wonderful voice and uncommon look.

12

A pianist working six hours a day,
So eager is she to learn to play.

13

Russian born with brown hair,
And of beauty has more than her share.

14

The lady who sang with the tall baritone
Has a charming face and lovely tone.

15

A lady who owns a fine string of beads
And a pair of soprano reeds.

16

She can play like a perfect rage
The piano, page after page,
Owing to your tutelage.

17

The last is a very fine poet,
This will show it. You know it.

NOLA VERNE

MME. MARIE CLARE

Not long ago this writer was privileged to make a trip out to our Municipal Sanitarium on the northwest side to witness the first entertainment given in the new auditorium by dancing pupils of Mme. Clare. The surroundings were most conducive to enjoyment, as one is impressed immediately upon entering the beautiful grounds, and the auditorium, just opened, is a splendidly equipped and imposing structure. And in addition to these, on this particular evening a very enlivening entertainment was provided. Mme. Clare, in presenting her girls as she does, is doing something altogether unique, for she stages in this way a performance which is semi-vaudeville, extremely varied, and both pretty and amusing. There is no doubt that the technic of her work is very fine, for her girls all possess a very unusual litheness of body, and they attempt poses and bends which seem all but impossible.

The costumes on this occasion were lovely and in keeping with the dances of many nations. The little company is, however, particularly versed in the technic of Egyptian dancing, an art of its own kind. They were certainly graceful and innately artistic from the smallest child who performed to the older ones who danced in solo and in group.

Mme. Clare and her girls, who are all very fond of her, have been doing a great deal of war work in the past year or two, entertaining soldiers and sailors, and they expect to go right on with their charitable work, dancing for sanitarium and hospital people who are so in need of this kind of entertainment. It is indeed a great work, and Mme. Clare and her little coterie are to be heartily congratulated.

ELLEN KINSMAN MANN

Mrs. Ellen Kinsman Mann, soprano and teacher of singing, is enjoying fine success with her summer class. The class lessons are of great interest also; the subject for this week's study was Oratorios and their interpretations. Miss Gladys Evans sang daily at Lyon & Healy concerts the past week. Margaret Becker, soprano, of Kenosha, Wis., has been engaged for a five weeks' tour with the Independent Chautauqua. Both are pupils of Mrs. Mann.

Kryl—Miss Marie Kryl, the splendid young Chicago pianist, who will spend next Winter in Switzerland, is with her family at Sutton Bay for the Summer. Miss Josy Kryl, violinist, is also a visitor there, and the two sisters are extremely popular socially as well as musically.

Gunster—Frederick Gunster of New York is one of the singers engaged for an appearance at the coming Lockport Festival.

AMERICAN CONSERVATORY

The artistic partnership, Silvio Scionti and Louise Hattstaedt-Winter, gave one of the series of morning musicales for the American Conservatory last Wednesday. Mrs. Winter sang charmingly and graciously, as always.

Mr. Scionti's playing was marked by the characteristics which are his only in all the field of piano playing in this city. There is no other local player heard by the chronicler who displays such a delicate touch and such sensitivity of phrasing and color as Scionti. His interpretation of the Debussy and other modern French numbers was exquisite. His playing of Chopin also revealed a height of dash and brilliancy of technic seldom achieved and an abandon which, if sometimes carried too far, was always fascinating.

A FLY SONG

The following "Fly Song" is taken from the Buffalo News:

Ten little flies
All in line;
One got a swat!
Then there were * * * * * * * * *

Nine little flies
Grimly sedate,
Licking their chops—
Swat! There were * * * * * * * *

Eight little flies
Raising some more—
Swat! Swat! Swat! Swat!
Then there were * * * *

Four little flies
Colored green-blue;
Swat! (Ain't it easy!)
Then there were * *

Two little flies
Dodged the civilian—
Early next day
There were a million!

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

Registers

One of the first questions asked by the girl student of her teacher is, invariably: "What do you think my voice is, soprano or contralto?" And she is sometimes much amazed when she does not receive an immediate reply, but is advised to "wait and see." It is so much the prevailing idea among the laity that the ability to "go up high" indicates a soprano voice, and its contrary a contralto, that they are in the habit of jumping to conclusions in regard to this matter.

Generalizations on this point are, however, no safer than generalizations usually are. It is the quality of the voice, not its range, that determines its place as soprano or contralto. Many contraltos have splendid high notes; in fact, all operatic contraltos must have them; while a soprano voice which is totally without sympathetic lower tones can hardly be considered a great one.

There is also the mezzo-soprano. In fact, many so-called contralto voices belong in this category. It is the quality of the voice and the manner in which nature sees to it that you take certain of your notes which determine your range. This holds true in either the male or the female voice, which brings us to the much discussed subject of registers.

This has been for many years a subject upon which musical doctors disagree. It has been found practical, however, to handle the female voice from the standpoint of three registers called, respectively, the head or upper register, the medium register, and the chest or lower register. There is, however, in the perfectly trained voice no evidence to the ear of the listener of these three registers. So perfect must be the transitions from one to another that, except in the mind of the singer, they must seem not to exist.

In regard to the male voice, a similar difference of opinion exists, one authority holding that in the case of tenors five-sixths of the voice lies in the chest register, leaving one-sixth for the head register, while in the cases of baritones and basses the entire register is chest. My own experience with men singers has been that their voices can be—should be—handled very similarly to those of women.

Returning to the girl's voice, with its head, medium and chest registers. It is better, if possible, to say little to the beginner of these registers, and thus avoid making her unduly conscious of them. It is possible with the average beginner to start work in the middle register, and by very gently and very gradually working up and down, keeping in mind always the arched tone, lead her safely through these danger zones with very little realization on her part that they are dangerous. Sometimes, however, a pupil brings to the teacher a voice so faulty in this respect that it is necessary to begin very early the explanation which is to set her right.

The handling of the voice in the three registers is identical for soprano and contralto, the difference being in the point of departure from the medium into the chest voice. The soprano will, of course, lie largely in the two upper registers, while that of the contralto will occupy principally the two lower.

Let us suppose that we have been working with our pupil's voice by means of the exercises already given, beginning in the middle voice, perhaps at B, keeping in mind the careful arching of the tone, the breath supply and the resonance, and coming down gradually into the chest register, where we know that the quality of the voice is going to change. It is not possible to say at exactly which note the voice, either soprano or contralto, will make this change, for it differs in various voices. The trained ear of the teacher must be warned by the quality of the voice as it approaches the change, and so determines the action. Speaking roughly, let us say that the soprano voice will very likely begin to take chest tones on D, and will probably not have more than two or three of them, while the contralto may begin her chest tones a note or two earlier and, of course, will have many more of them.

The change is not a great one. Coming down, the pupil brings the same round, full tones that she is using in her medium voice, reinforcing them, as she changes her register, with the richer—one might almost say the more masculine—quality of the chest register. In the contralto voice these notes, as they go below middle C, seem almost to be in the chest—which explains the name, "chest register"—but they are not in the chest, nor are they in the throat. They are arched, brought to the teeth and thrown out of the face just as the middle voice is. Indeed, the difference is one of quality rather than of placement. To make a chest tone one puts into the medium tone an added richness, breadth, and depth which suggest rather than resemble the tones in a man's voice.

This action must never be felt in the throat, and should never result in a sore throat or tired vocal chords. It will, however, result in both of these disasters, combined with a bad break in the voice, should the pupil persist in taking this chest quality higher than nature intended her particular voice to take it. It is the teacher's duty to know where nature has placed this limit in the pupil's voice. I have known contralto voices which could and did with impunity sing F or even F sharp in the chest register. I have also had voices come to me with weak spots or breaks which necessitated weeks of patient work as a result of this same action.

In the ideal contralto voice this chest quality is so perfectly handled that we are only conscious of an added richness and breadth, and are not reminded even remotely of the chest or throat. On the other hand, we often hear chest tones used throughout the medium voice by singers in vaudeville, or the like, who must have a certain volume of tone and who have no better idea than this of how to obtain it. This, of course, destroys the middle and upper voice, leaving only the harsh and ugly chest tones, carried out of their range and shorn of their beauty.

The medium register is the one in which the pupil, up to this time, has been doing her principal work. It needs no especial treatment, in normal cases, other than we have given it. In cases where the pupil has weakened this middle voice from undue use of the chest quality, only patient and careful—yes, and, above all—gentle work along the lines already laid down will bring back the power and beauty of the middle register. Never try to "help it out" with chest quality, for this is fatal. You may substitute a medium tone for a chest tone (indeed many contraltos do this throughout the entire chest register), but you cannot reverse the rule. Contraltos who ignore the chest register in this way are, however, to my notion, mezzo-soprani, who very frequently masquerade as bona fide contraltos. The genuine contralto uses the chest quality naturally in the chest register. That is how we know that she is a real contralto.

The upper or head register is the most easily described of the three. It emerges from the medium register at about E flat, and ascends, always in an arched tone, up, up, over and out from the masque of the face, from behind the eyes, let us say, to be thrown in an expanded tone against the imaginary point outside the face. Remember always that an expanded tone does not mean a too-open tone. By this I mean that it must not be spread or flattened, as it so often is. Nor must it be allowed to drop back into the throat. The entire scale, from the lowest to the highest tone, must mount in a direct line. There must be no wobbling, no swaying back and forth, no unevenness anywhere.

Why is it that so often a high note makes the listener, though he be ignorant of voice technic, mentally clench his throat? The tone has been allowed to slip back, away from the line, into the throat. The singer's throat is being strained, and the listener's throat aches in sympathy. Again, you hear a head tone which is "spread" or "flared," rather than expanded. It is a tone without meaning, without purpose—a wavering, irresolute tone which misses its mark because it is not sent out in a line with the others. The perfect high note, which is the perfect climax to a perfect scale, proceeds from the direct line of the middle and chest voice, full of a ringing, vibrant quality—not a tremolo—supported by the breath, directed at a point outside the face.

With the male voice we proceed in a similar manner as regards the principles of breath control, voice placement and building. The voice must be arched, raised out of the throat region, and filled with "body," just as is the woman's voice. The quality of the male voice, with the possible exception of the tenor's high notes, remains chest.

NATIONAL AMERICAN MUSIC FESTIVAL

World's Greatest Week of American Music Opens at Lockport, N. Y., Monday, September 1, and Closes Sunday Night, September 7—Sixty-two Prominent Artists, Who Represent the Highest Ideals in the American Concert and Operatic Fields, Appearing—Object of Great Festival to Promote the Cause of Native Artists, Composers and Music

Five years ago, to be exact, a unanimous determination to advance the cause of native artists and composers was started in Lockport, N. Y., a small city set upon a hill, located twenty-six miles from Buffalo, twenty-two miles from Niagara Falls, and whose gradually sloping hillside reaches to the beautiful shores of Lake Ontario, twelve miles to the northward.

There is no particular reason why this little city, famous for its old-fashioned hospitality and canal locks, should have become the mecca for music lovers who worship at the shrine of pure Americanism other than that the man who was the founder and pioneer of this great American movement lived there. From the staging of the first all-American artists' series (a modest beginning) to the present festival, recognized as the greatest held in this country, its growth has been gradual and certain.

Within the past few years leading managers, music publishers, artists, speakers and prominent business clubs of the country have all gone on record as friends and actuaries of this great new musical American propaganda.

Musical patriotism and expression has taken form at this great festival—the public is interested. From nearly every state in the Union during the first week of September gather men and women prominent in the musical life of the country. The American festival was established primarily as an institution for the highest artistic standards and to help rid, if possible, the unjust discrimination that had been placed against our own artists and composers.

The engagement of American-born artists, performing the best works of American-born composers, and in the case of vocal numbers sung in the American language with the great success that has resulted thereto, is proof positive that the American concert artists are the equal of those of any other nation in the world.

A glance at the prospectus of the National American Music Festival would indicate that its domestic limitations will be no curtailment of the eminence of its artists or the excellence of its concerts.

A list to conjure with.

Among the many great American artists who are appearing at the National American Festival this year we find such well-known names as Carrie Jacobs-Bond, Mrs. Edward MacDowell, Florence Macbeth, Arthur Middleton, Frederica Gerhardt Downing, Oliver Denton, Lila Robeson, Mme. Sturkow-Ryder, Frederick Gunster, Melvena Passmore, Marie Sundelius, Charles W. Clark, Wynne Pyle, Cecil Burleigh, Arthur Hartmann, Oscar Seagle, Lucille Stevenson, Edna Gunnar Peterson, Blanche Da Costa, John Powell, Kathleen Howard, Orville Harrold, Edna De Lima, Maria Conde, Gaylord Yost, Mme. Marie Zendt, Mable Corlew Smith, Harvey Hindermyer, Pittsburgh Artists' Trio, Rubinstein Chorus of Buffalo, Dr. Carver Williams, Earle Tuckerman, Vera Kaighn, Harriet Case, Cleveland Bohnet, Kathryn Meisle, Marguerite Ringo, and a score or more equally well known.

While the management does not claim that these are the greatest American artists, they do claim, however, that these represent the highest ideals in the American concert and operatic fields.

The fate of all such estimable adventures in art invariably hinges upon that beloved, impersonal and ineluctible agency which we call the public—the National American Music Festival is approved by the public in general. It is a great altruistic movement run without profit or gain and is declared an educational institution by the United States government.

Music News

Vol. 11 Chicago, August 1, 1919 No. 31

PASSING COMMENT

Music News today prints the first authentic and complete program of the National American Music Festival, which is to be held at Lockport, N. Y., the first week of September.

It requires but a glance at this program to show that the event will be stupendous in its outreach and influence, and a more carefully analytical review of it will emphasize the fact that not only will many established American artists be presented but also many younger ones who need this encouragement, and not only do nearly all the established American composers find place in the programs of the week but also there are many new ones from among whom it may be possible to discover brilliant as well as new ideas.

Dr. Vail McIntyre, organist and lecturer at Oklahoma City, Okla., has been delivering some addresses at the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago recently, which have been very much worth hearing and which have provoked much comment.

A short article in Music News last week quoted Mr. McIntyre as saying that since music should be a matter of service rather than of money-making, and worship rather than entertainment, it should be donated to the church.

As a matter of fact, Dr. McIntyre was referring only to chorus singing when he made this statement; for he believes fully in good quartet choirs, and he thinks that a really good quartet choir is so rare as well as so valuable that payment for its services should be at the highest point of liberality.

And in this belief Music News concurs absolutely. For there is no part of the Nothing-for-Nothing propaganda more important than that church singers should be paid well for their work and that a church should expect also that a big chorus choir (immensely desirable as it is) should cost a lot of money to maintain.

As to the worship part of music in a church, every congregation has a perfect right to expect from its choir the most serious and dignified conformity to the beliefs and the routine of the church.

And the church has also the right to choose the kind of music it wishes to have presented, and it is the business of the paid singers to furnish it.

For instance, if a church really wants simple Gospel hymns for offertory, it has a perfect right to ask for them, and no singer who is unwilling to do this sort of work and do it willingly and well should accept a place in that particular church.

"Old things are passed away; all things are become new."

—Second Corinthians, v., 17.

The "raising of standard" is all right—and the keeping up of it if possible—but each church, just like each other public institution, has a right to know its own mind in reference to the sort of music it wishes to hear. And if it pays a price it should expect to receive that kind.

The singer can and should, in his own concerts and in his teaching, devote himself to whatever grade of music he prefers; and the better it is, the more honor and credit to him. But when he accepts an engagement to sing either for a church or any other public society he must be governed by the wishes of that society as to repertoire.

And this, I take it, is real service—to do the thing that is required and paid for as intelligently, as well and as pleasingly as it can possibly be done.

Mr. Campanini has been reported in a recent interview as saying that he does not believe that there is any future for grand opera and that we need not worry about the lack of new works, for the reason that they will not long be needed.

This viewpoint, so frankly expressed, is something of a startler. But perhaps there is truth in it.

At least it may be very true indeed that the days of grand opera as it is now understood are really numbered and that the grand opera of the future will be quite a different thing.

We have considered grand opera an exotic always, and we have thought that it was best expressed in languages other than our own.

Why not think of it as something that can be brought much nearer home—something that can be democratized.

The subjects used in this form of music might very readily be much more in line with common, everyday democratic thought, and the language might be English with decidedly good results.

We have said that we believe in the democratization and the Americanization of music.

Why not apply these to opera?

Democratize it by making it less of an exotic—less of an extravagance.

Americanize it by using American subjects, the English language and American artists.

The experiment of English opera is to be given a new trial in Chicago the coming season, and there is no reason to argue that it may not be much more successful than ever before. Certainly the American public is ready for Americanization of music.

We surely want no opera in the German language, for some years to come at least, and there is no valid reason why we should let Italian and French language and artists dominate our opera stage.

Perhaps the big success of English opera

As to Our Directory Columns

The name of every Musician in the United States—every Composer, every Manager, every Publisher, every Teacher, every School, and every Manufacturer of Music Instruments, should be in the Classified Directory Columns of THE MUSIC NEWS.

It is a fact today that Managers, Directors of Schools, Program Committees, Festival Directors, Lyceum Promoters—in fact, everybody who has to do with Musicians, has formed the habit, when the address of a Musician is wanted, of looking in our Directory Columns for it.

We have been told again and again,

"Your Directory Is the Most Useful List Published in the United States"

Even if you have no intention of doing more public work—even though you are located where no change seems possible—it is still advisable to have your name in our columns in order that your friends, the managers, the publishers and the public at large may have a ready means of finding your address.

And—if you ARE in the field for increased engagements or activities of any kind you will find no medium so useful as this.

We have Classifications for every Instrument, for the Voice, for Publishers, Manufacturers, Composers, Directors, Ensembles, Theory Teachers, Dancing, Dramatic Art, Clubs, Choir Boy Training, Pageantry, Community Singing Directors, Managers, Accompanists, Public School Music Teachers, and others.

If we have not your Classification we will create a Department for you.

The cost of this service is only fifteen dollars a year, but the service itself is invaluable.

During the last season we carried in the Classified Columns hundreds of names. We want to carry additional hundreds this season, and expect to make the list as near complete as we possibly can.

Payment for this service can be made Annually, Semi-Annually or Quarterly—and, as we send THE MUSIC NEWS to each one whose name is in these columns, you need have no further expense for subscription.

Display Advertising in MUSIC NEWS is considered today the most useful in America, and you will—eventually—be in the field for that. But, meantime, you should not delay one week in having your name in our Classified Directory Columns, for this is AN INVALUABLE SERVICE.

long awaited is even now at hand, and perhaps in this success will come the refutation of Mr. Campanini's prediction that the days of grand opera are numbered.

The editor of Music News is in receipt of the following letter:

Chicago, July 21, 1919.

Editor of Music News:

I have just returned from Indianapolis and since returning have read your article on "Practical Music Questions of the Moment." Also your editorial.

I wish your Minnesota address might go to every professional musician in America. If it did I feel sure that organization and standardization of American music and musicians would not be far off.

Isn't it possible to start that organization right here in Chicago? I should like to be a charter member.

(Signed) AMBROSE WYRICK.

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.

The pupils of Mrs. Margaret Hilary gave several successful programs as a conclusion to their season's work.

The graduating recital of Miss Gratchen Sack, pupil of Samuel Thorstenberg of the Jamestown Conservatory of Music, took place at Norden Hall, Thursday evening, July 10. She was assisted by Ruth Thomas, soprano; Mathew Mahoney, tenor. The program was artistically given.

Eighty members of Jamestown's Choral Society assisted the Chautauqua Choir in the rendition of "Judas Maccabæus," by Handel, at the Chautauqua Institution on the night of July 21.

A number of the distant members of the National Opera Club of America met at dinner at the Samuels Hotel on Sunday, July 27. The guest of honor was Madame Katherine Evans Von Klenner, president and founder of the club, who is spending the summer at her cottage at Point Chautauqua.

Franklin Cannon of Carnegie Hall, New York City, is spending the summer in Jamestown, as has been his custom for several years past. He has a class in advanced piano.

The Chicago Grand Opera Sextet will make an appearance at Celoron Auditorium Monday evening, August 11. The sextet is composed of Jessie Christian, soprano; Irene Pavloska, contralto; Warren Proctor and Forrest Lamont, tenors; Desire Defrere, baritone, and James Godard, basso—all soloists of the Chicago Grand Opera Company. They will appear in a high-class operatic program.

GUNSTER AT N. F. M. C. BIENNIAL

Frederick Gunster was featured twice on the program of the National Federation of Musical Clubs' convention, held at Peterborough, N. H., during the week of June

FREDERICK GUNSTER AND MRS. A. J. OCHSNER

29—on Tuesday as singer; later in the week as one of the speakers.

Mr. Gunster's musical contribution consisted of a group of American folk and art songs, enthusiastically received by the large audience and splendidly sung by the tenor.

It was through Mr. Gunster, perhaps, that the American artists' viewpoint on the subject of the clubs' concert series was first presented to such a representative audience. In a brief address full of practical suggestions Mr. Gunster championed the cause of the American who has the real ability to make good and those native artists who have already substantiated their claims for recognition. The gist of the tenor's well-delivered arguments was the means by which the clubs and artists would mutually prosper.

The title of the prize to be awarded through the N. F. M. C. biennially for the best young American violinist is the William L. Whitney, and not with the middle initial G., as printed in some journals.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE

The student concert was given at the Chicago Musical College as announced, with a single exception, the exception being the presentation of Mrs. Antoinette Garnes instead of Miss Kuerth, who was ill. Mrs. Garnes sang a Hallette Gilberte song, "Moonlight and Starlight," and it was delightful to see how, with good interpretation on the singer's part, this American song fitted into the splendid program of the morning.

The recital started off with the forceful Miss Elsie Barge at the first piano in the Concerto (Slow Movement) of Rubinstein, and this was a splendid number. Lygia Zabrocki, who followed, had studied thoughtfully and was by no means stumped by the intervals nor the vocables in her "Boheme" selection. Harold Ayres is known to many Chicagoans, and made himself known to many more by his adequate rendering of the first Saint-Saens Concerto for violin.

The voice of Debussy is rarely silent, and this time his "Goldfish" came to vary the program. While not as æsthetically lovely as some of his compositions, it is without a peer for originality and interest. Always popular is the wonderful "Polonaise Americaine" (Carpenter). These last two numbers were done by Carolyn Schuyler, whose attainments are very high.

However much we approve of the no-encore restrictions, there was a point in the program when everybody regretted that such restrictions existed. This was when Clark E. Snell of Oklahoma University sang "O Lisbone" (Donizetti). Such a number, well done, yet in a foreign tongue, seemed to call for a short song in English just to get the hearers more intimately under the spell of the rich voice and good interpretation which were evinced. Adrien Freische won laurels in the clever execution of well-chosen pieces. His tone has depth and warmth in abundance.

The last vocal number was by a young contralto, who put her big voice into the well-known "Adieu, Forets" (Tschaikowsky), and produced an impressive rendering. She has unlimited possibilities vocally.

Edward Collins, guest artist, well known in this part of the country, gave the fine treat of the morning when he played three piano pieces with great brilliancy and finish. Altogether, the recital was an enjoyable event, and, even more than that, it was an inspiration.

THE CHICAGO PIANO COLLEGE

The following interesting program was given at 927 Kimball Building on Tuesday evening, July 22, and an opportunity must not be lost to congratulate the young artists upon the individuality shown in their performance. For students, they were unusually good to listen to.

Mr. Watt, in the duos and the duet numbers, took the secundo and second piano parts, and added to the interest of the evening. Miss Roseman did well in the absorbing little story-play, "The Lion and the Lady," in which Lady Margaret goes masquerading as a scullery maid in the house of a famous actor who has an aversion to conventional, well-born ladies. Miss Roseman studies at the Lyceum Arts Conservatory, but Miss Marks and Miss Beall are of the Chiacgo Piano College.

THE VERSATILITY OF HAZEL DELL NEFF

Hazel Dell Neff, soprano, who is spending the summer at her old home in Plymouth, Ind., resting and in preparation of her coming season, gave an exhibition of versatility one day last week which still further endeared her to the people of the Indiana city, which has so often been delighted with her singing.

A Chautauqua was in course at Plymouth, and an orchestra which was scheduled for a concert on last Tuesday afternoon before a sold-out house telegraphed at 11 in the morning that it would be impossible to make the railroad connections.

Miss Neff was appealed to to take the place, and as it happened that a first-rate accompanist was at hand, she consented to do so, and at 2:30 the same afternoon went on and sang a long and varied recital so well as to create a genuine sensation.

The bill for last week included an unusually good picture—"A Sporting Chance"—in which the admirers of Ethel Clayton had an exceptional opportunity to revel in her talent and her charm; and there were besides pictures of current events away beyond the average.

The music remained at the same high standard, and Mr. Mangold, director of the orchestra, himself appeared as soloist of the week.

The concerted numbers included an arrangement of the "Kammanoi Ostrow" (No. 22), by Rubinstein, which has not been excelled at any time in effectiveness.

The orchestral part of this was in itself sufficiently good, but the whole number was vastly augmented in beauty through the most skillful introduction of the organ by Mildred Fitzpatrick and also through the use of bells and of the piano in simulation of the prescribed harp effects.

Not only in this did Miss Fitzpatrick again show her definite talent and her great musical feeling, but also in her accompaniments to the big picture she displayed an uncanny sympathy with the subject and a skill in embellishment which place her almost in a class by herself in so far as picture organ playing is concerned. A RAY OF SUNSHINE

In fact, there were two of them—Mrs. Ray, a Chicago teacher of piano, and Miss Ruth Ray, who is soon to enter a professional career as an American artist violinist and whose presence will illuminate Carnegie Hall in her first New York recital in October.

. . . . . .

Miss Ray is spending the Summer at her Chicago home after a Winter in New York under the tutelage of Leopold Auer, and with Mrs. Ray was a most welcome visitor to Music News office recently.

Many of us have watched the career of Ruth Ray with constantly growing appreciation and regard for the past ten years—for she began the study of violin in this city when a very small child.

From the very first she has shown the greatest of talent and the finest sort of individualistic music feeling.

She has played in a great many Chicago functions, some of them at top-notch of importance, and she has appeared also with the utmost of success in concert tour throughout the West.

And now, under the management of Antonia Sawyer, the New York manager with a vision, she is being booked for the coming season in the most dignified and legitimate way, and following her appearance at Carnegie she is bound to find many other outlets for her beautiful gifts.

Her Chicago friends congratulate her to the utmost on her recent successes and join in the hope and the belief of a very great future for her, and they await impatiently, also, the announcement of a Chicago appearance.

AT THE GARRICK

After waiting nineteen weeks for the opportunity, and after hearing scores of people express an opinion about "Scandal," this writer finally found time one day last week to see the play and to record a few impressions of it.

That "Scandal" is popular was proven at this time through the fact of an absolutely sold-out house, in spite of the hot weather. But it must be confessed that the audience was not the most discriminating in the world, for much of the finer play of words inherent in the drama was distinctly "over their heads," while there was a constant watchfulness for the risque lines and a constant distortion of the humorous ones, which was trying to the serious listener, to say the least.

For, in spite of its reputation of being the most daring thing ever put on the American stage, "Scandal" is yet, in reality, a very brilliant piece of literary work, and its story, though highly impossible, and its situations, though absurd in the extreme, are yet fascinating, and its people, though so highly colored, intensely interesting.

It is too late in the day to offer any analysis or synopsis of the story—nearly everybody knows it now—but for the benefit of the few who may not have seen it a brief statement may not be amiss.

Beatrix Vanderdyke is a pampered daughter of the Very Rich, and while inherently good and even brilliant, she has allowed herself to grow into an attitude where her whole aim is to extract amusement from the world, and, tiring of lighter amusements, she is, when the story opens, engaged in that giddy pastime known as "playing with fire." Inasmuch as she offers every possible encouragement to the professional roue of the story short of actual acceptance of his offers, and, suddenly discovering that she has gone a step too far, and realizing that she must explain a night visit to a bachelor building immediately to her outraged family (just come into possession of the facts), she claims as her husband another occupant of the building than the one she really was visiting, and he magnanimously allows the deception that they are husband and wife to stand.

But, although there had been previous overtures as to a real marriage between Beatrix and himself, he is thoroughly disgusted with the selfishness and the heedlessness of the girl and resolves to give her a lesson that will last her through life.

The way in which he does this is hardly a proper story for mere black and white, but in the telling of it on the stage at the Garrick it is so deftly and delicately handled that it passes muster night after night before a mixed audience and leaves most hearers palpitating with sympathy for the man rather than the girl.

For, as the man says a little earlier in the story, "what she really needs is the proper application of the back of a hair brush."

However, the last act belongs all to the girl, and she is shown before the play ends to be really lovable as well as bright, and of course the happy ending involves the real marriage of the two who have played at cross-purposes throughout the story.

Francine Larrimore as The Girl is very pretty and in the emotional moments rises to fine heights.

She has a most irritating way of speaking, however, in ordinary conversation, and it is difficult indeed to understand what she says.

She "swallows" her words distressingly and seems to take not the slightest pains to make it possible for the audience to understand what she says.

Mr. Cherry, on the contrary, is a model of distinctness as well as of refined and forceful style, and his performance of the part of The Man is very nearly without flaw.

The others are all good and equally balanced, but they do not matter much, for, as stated above, the whole play is a battle royal between The Man and The Girl, and the others are merely to fill in and to "feed" these two parts.

By all means go to see "Scandal" if you have not already seen it, but do not say afterward that I failed to warn you that the play is uncomfortably and at times unnecessarily risque, but also, and just as emphatically, it is brilliant and thoroughly interesting, and on the whole its morale is a really high one, for it proves most convincingly the dangers of an idle life and it shows as nothing else on the stage has ever shown that no woman, be she ever so beautiful and clever, can afford to play with fire.

AT THE COLONIAL

The chief reason for a review of "Angel Face" lies in the fact that the music for it was written by Victor Herbert.

It was a bit of bad advice which named the piece, for "Angel Face" has no special significance in the story and it might just as well (and more euphoniously) be called "Bright Eyes," "Golden Hair" or even "Dimpled Chin."

In this production two things are to be especially noted other than the characteristic music, one of these being agreeable to chronicle, the other disagreeable.

To take up the latter first, it must be confessed that it is disheartening to find in "Angel Face" a confirmation of the suspicion that the coming season in the theater (or one had better say the musical comedy theater) is to be devoted in a sickening degree to dancing.

This form of art when administered in appropriately small doses is agreeable enough, but when it dominates everything and slops all over the stage continuously, as in "Angel Face," it becomes monotonous.

It must be admitted, however, that much of the "Angel Face" dancing is pretty and skillful, it is all well dressed, and the eccentric work of Jack Donahue is exceptionally fine.

The more agreeable factor in the presentation of "Angel Face" is the absence of a big chorus.

Always, to this writer—the fact of twenty or thirty girls and men lined up behind the soloist and, all together, singing songs, doing certain steps and making absolutely the same gestures, has seemed the acme of humor.

But in this new musical comedy, while there are a great many people on the stage they are all in name parts and each one, when on the stage, has something to do with the actual story.

No lining up for chorus numbers—no unanimity of facial expression or posture.

And this, I take it—is distinctly more artistic than the old way and, equally, it is infinitely more agreeable.

The book of "Angel Face" incorporates a very definite and thoroughly interesting story and the diction employed is sane, crisp and humorous.

It is also, to the credit of the librettist, generally very clean, and at times it is really poetical and elevated in trend.

With one exception—and this is so glaring an exception that if the librettist is responsible he deserves to be hissed by each audience that hears the vulgar line, and if John E. Young is responsible he needs to be disciplined.

For it is Mr. Young who, after playing with perfect naturalness and ease throughout two acts and uttering many nice lines and filling many clean and manly obligations—suddenly, in the last act, delivers himself of a line which is of unparalleled vulgarity and which constitutes a decided blemish on the whole performance.

Mr. Young is otherwise neat and attractive and has a nice part, the singing numbers of which he does exceptionally well.

All the cast is good—some better. Alan Edwards as the sculptor has a good voice and nice presence—also, he dances well.

Marguerite Zender is a very pretty Betty, but does not sing very much or very convincingly, while Ada Meade, who sings better, does not look quite so pretty.

An eccentric part is well done by Minerva Grey, and a grandmother part by Sarah McVicker is good, as those done by her always are.

This character, inheriting a lot of money, comes from Keokuk to Chicago to spend it, and she tells her Chicago nephew, "The first thing I want to see is the peacocks in peacock alley."

. . . . . .

The Herbert music (saving the best till the last) is really delightful.

There is no attempt at the grand opera style, but each special number is characteristic and "catchy," while the whole play is knit together by a series of musical links at once logical and binding.

There is a very wonderful "ragtime" exhibit in the second act, and one or two of the set numbers are fine, especially the waltz song, but, personally, I do not care for "I Might Be Your Once in a While," and wonder that Herbert would consent to set music to such awkward verse.

AT THE STUDEBAKER

The program of "Sunshine," in which Richard Carle is appearing at the Studebaker, says that the book is by Duncan, the music by Alexander Johnstone, and the "colloquialisms" by Mr. Carle.

The colloquialisms are by far the best of the three items—for of quip, smart talk and witty repartee Mr. Carle is unquestionably a past master.

As an example, a few remembered items are here quoted:

"I have written an opera," says Richard Skinner (played by Carle), "which I am calling 'Ivan Awfulitch.'"

"Is it about the revolution?" asks someone.

"No," he replies; "It was one of the causes."

"I am a true American," he says, too. "I can even sing the second verse of 'The Star Spangled Banner.'"

"When were you married?" he asks Mrs. Trotter, a bright young woman of the Follies.

"Usually in June," she replies.

"What did Juliet make out of Hamlet?" he asks this same gay lady.

"A ham, of course," she replies. "And Cleopatra made a mark out of Marc Antony."

"Well," retorts Mr. Skinner, "Lydia Pinkham made a pill out of Mr. Pinkham."

Mr. Carle, as everybody knows, is droll, unctious and natural. He walks through the Skinner part quite unconcernedly, dropping witticisms as he ambles along and embellishing the scenes with many a merry song and dance.

Milton Dawson as Mr. Trotter is a splendid first lieutenant to him; Gertrude Alexander as Mrs. Trotter proves herself amiable and talented even though only a moderately good singer, while the young woman who plays the part of Santa shows both dramatic talent and an exceptionally good voice.

The locale of the play—very nebulous for the most part—is Spain, and this, of course, gives warrant for splendid color schemes in the dressing.

The plot is tenuous but logical, and the stage settings and management are sumptuous.

The music is of very ordinary caliber, but a good deal of it is well presented.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

Tuesday evening at Music Hall, Evanston, Ruth Goodsmith, pianist, and Herman Ashbaucher, tenor, from the classes of Charles J. Haake and Walter Allen Stults, gave a delightful program before an audience enthusiastic in approval of the artistic work.

Miss Goodsmith has been heard by this writer and it must be said with sincerity that she has developed under Mr. Haake's guidance in a way worthy of high praise.

She has a fleet, sure technic, a keen sense of rhythm and a musicianship that make her interpretations sane and artistic. Miss Goodsmith was heard in the last two groups of Debussy, Straus-Tausig, Grainger and Liszt.

Excellent playing and solidity made her work distinctive.

Mr. Ashbaucher has fine gifts musically and a lovely tenor to set them forth. His guide, Mr. Stults, has set him on the road that will take him somewhere, not anywhere. His progress is to be noted in all types of songs, not counting a two years' war vacation.

"In Native Worth," I am told, was a fine piece of work—I am told by good authority—and in the second hearing Mr. Ashbaucher set forth a group that called for tone color, musicianship and story-telling. He met all three demands with ease and fine artistic style. He should be heard often the coming season.

Miss Jane Watt gave him musicianly support at the piano.

CHARLES W. CLARK IN RECITAL

At the Bush Conservatory, last Thursday, Charles W. Clark assisted in a recital given by Richard Czerwonky and Moses Boguslawski. Accompaniments were played by John J. Blackmore and Ruth Bradley, and the whole affair was most successful and pleasing to an unusually large audience.

Following is the program:

Sonata in D minor for Violin and Piano.....Brahms
Allegro (moderato); adagio; un poco presto e con sentimento; presto agitato
Messrs. Czerwonky and Boguslawski

Romance
Two Modern Sketches
Dance
.....Czerwonky
Mr. Czerwonky

Trois Ballade de Francois Villon.....Claude Debussy
Ballade de Villon a s'amye
Ballade que feit villon a la requeste de sa mere pour prier Nostre-Dame
Ballade des Femmes de Paris
Mr. Clark

Six Caprices .....Paganani-Liszt
Mr. Boguslawski
Accompaniments by John J. Blackmore and Ruth Bradley

The three Debussy Ballads which Mr. Clark sang were fascinating bits of old French poetry set to airs with quaint atmosphere and color. Mr. Clark cleverly introduced the audience to the ancient French with a story of his varied experiences with these songs. He said when he sang them in Paris the press praised his mastery of the old French pronunciation, and that, some time afterward, he had occasion to sing them in New York, and the critics criticized him severely for his bad French.

Mr. Boguslawski played with artistic acumen and technical skill, as did Mr. Czerwonky also.

Two more capable and efficient accompanists could not have been found than Mr. Blackmore and Miss Bradley. They were both technically equipped and artistically alive to the nuances and delicacies of the accompanist's art.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

EDWIN STANLEY SEDER IN ORGAN RECITAL AT EVANSTON

Few indeed are the young artists who have come to Chicago and found such immediate and enthusiastic acceptance as has Edwin Stanley Seder. This brilliant young organist came here from the Southwest less than two years ago, and yet in that short time he has served as the soloist in the Fourth Presbyterian Church Thursday afternoon organ recitals and some of the Sunday services throughout the incumbency of Eric De Lamarter as conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. He has been the regular organist at the splendid First Congregational Church of Oak Park for the past year, and just now his engagement as head of the organ department of Northwestern University School of Music (Evanston) has been announced, as also his listing as head of the organ department at the Cosmopolitan School of Music in Kimball Hall.

As an introductory function in Evanston he was presented in recital at Fisk Hall on last Thursday evening.

For once Evanston was very late in arrival, and also—for once—Evanston was very noisy in finding seats, so that the first number of the program was much disturbed by the dropping of seats, the scuffle of feet on the bare floor, etc.

In spite of this, however, the function proved to be exceptionally fine; for, though the audience was small, it was uncommonly appreciative, and—very complimentary to Mr. Seder—it was increasingly so throughout the evening.

Fisk Hall, though out of the beaten path quite a little, is nevertheless an ideal place for organ recitals.

It is right alongside the lake, and when the windows are all open, as on last Thursday, the audience can not only see the lake and feel the cool breezes from it but can also, and very distinctly, hear the swish of the waters, which, of course, when not boisterous, amalgamate most pleasantly with the music inside the hall.

Particularly apropos and lovely was this accompaniment in the case of "Midsummer Idyl," a charming little piece written by Mr. Seder, in which the melody line, definite and original, has the effect of a high, light voice singing over a peculiar but very effectively droning accompaniment which, while it suggests the Lemare Andantino, is in no sense a plagairism.

The program opened with the Sonata in E minor by James H. Rogers, a very pleasing though not too profound composition, of reasonable length.

The Allegro is brisk and full-throated, the Andante rather uninteresting, the Scherzo a sparkling joy, and the Intermezzo e Fuga a skillful, pleasing bit.

Mr. Seder presented it for every iota of its musical and poetical significance.

This artist has remarkably vivid interpretative abilities, and while his playing is beautifully suave when that style is the requirement of the piece, it also is capable of the most dramatic and brilliant treatment of numbers so disposed.

His playing of the Fantasie and Fugue in B flat (A. P. F. Boely) was therefore a bit of scintillant virtuosity seldom attained and never excelled, and the same statement may be made of his work in the Yon Toccata, the Bonnet Variations de Concert, and the Finale from the Sixth Symphony of Widor.

Widor was further represented by the Adagio from the same work and Yon by his L'Organo Primitivo, a unique and pleasing piece which was played unusually well by Mr. Seder.

These numbers were at a high point of refinement and of well-colored cantabile style, and these points were well conserved also in an Andante of Debussy.

Altogether Mr. Seder showed rare skill in his general outlook upon his numbers, fine discrimination in his use of combinations, virtuosity of the greatest sort in technic, especially that of the pedals, and a general knowledge of organ style and repertoire which placed him positively in the front rank of organists who have delighted the discriminative public of Evanston.

DANIEL MAYER REACHES ENGLAND

A cable received at his office the past week announced the safe arrival in Liverpool of Daniel Mayer, the New York concert manager. Mr. Mayer crossed on the Baltic and will be away five or six weeks.

MARIA WINETZKAJA

A mezzo of fine accomplishments is Maria Winetzkaja, for she belongs to that unusual class of artists to whom the operatic and concert fields are equally available.

It is not often that the successful opera singer meets with the same degree of favor when giving a recital program, but Mme. Winetzkaja has proved by her appearance in opera throughout cities of the United States and Cuba and by her recent New York recital, which won for her a huge success, that she is not limited to either field.

Mme. Winetzkaja is of Russian birth. She is an accomplished linguist, speaking English, Russian, Italian, French, German and Spanish. Her English enunciation was particularly praised by the New York critics, and her Russian is unqualifiedly one of the very best ever heard on this side of the Atlantic.

She began her training abroad at the Imperial School of Music at Kishenev, Russia, but finished it in this country. From the Institute of Musical Art in New York she received the degree of artist. She has been a member of the Boston National Grand Opera Company and of the Bracale Opera Company, and her career has been notable for many operatic successes.

MME. LISETTE JOSTY-HAMMOND SCHOOL OF SINGING—THE ART OF BEL CANTO

Mme. Lisette Josty-Hammond, the well-known expounder of "perfect emission of voice through correct enunciation of Italian vowels and syllables," owing to the urgent demand made upon her time and the necessity of larger quarters has transferred her studio to apartments 64-65 Metropolitan Opera House Building, New York.

Mme. Lisette Josty-Hammond's method, based on the principles and laws governing the art of bel canto, which has met with the greatest success everywhere and has been adopted by some of the foremost concert and opera singers of Europe and America, deals with the natural emission of the singing voice through the correct and distinct enunciation of Italian vowels and syllables. The artist is thereby enabled to sing and speak clearly not only in Italian but in all modern languages, and most especially in English.

Already the method has proved to be invaluable to American vocalists in that it has corrected the many rooted evils which compress the sounds through bad enunciation. It does away with throaty and mouthy voices and places the tones immediately forward, giving them a full and clear resonance and that warm quality so prized in Italian voices.

However, let it be understood that it is not enough for the English singer to have mastered the Italian language in order to acquire all that this wonderful method, based upon scientific, physiological principles, can give. Indeed few are the pupils who, through the study of the language alone, succeed in understanding the secret of its purity and musical qualities, and in eliminating from their diction the strong characteristics of their mother tongue, thus missing that which forms the greatest prerogative and charm of "la bella lingua Italiana."

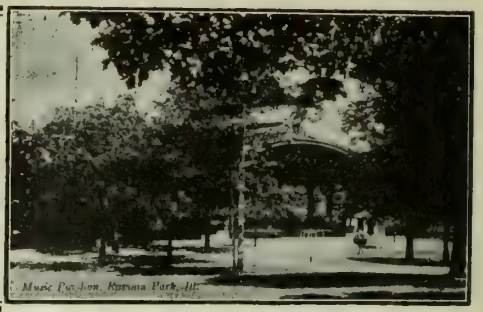
Music at RAVINIA PARK



Ravinia drew a succession of splendid audiences throughout the past week, and the performances were kept up to the same splendid standard which this year seems to have been determined upon for every afternoon and every evening.

Monday Evening

The following splendid orchestra program was given with great effect under the baton of Richard Hageman, the soloists being chosen from the membership of the orchestra:

The Star Spangled Banner
Overture—The Impresario ..... Mozart
Symphony Oxford, G major ..... Haydn
Adagio, allegro spiritoso; adagio; menuetto; presto
Solo for Harp .....
Polonaise in E ..... Liszt
Adagio ..... Bruch
Solo for Violin .....
Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak

Tuesday Evening

On Tuesday evening was given a "Cavalleria" performance, with Alice Gentle in her fine delineation of Santuzza, disclosing again the remarkable qualities of her voce. She was supported by a good, all-around cast.

This was followed by a concert, in which was included numbers by Saint-Saens, Dubois and Liszt, under Mr. Hageman's direction reaching a fine height of artistry.

Wednesday Evening
"L'Elixir D'Amore"

This charming opera of Donizetti, the novelty of the season at Ravinia, and for us a revival, proved just the type of opera to make a great impression on an out-of-door stage. There was, on Wednesday night, a splendid audience in the spirit to enjoy, and they were certainly not disappointed, for the singers and the audience both went away in the best of moods. And why not? A lovely, rustic, old-fashioned opera, with just enough comedy in it, just enough of good chorus singing and just enough of love-making. The roles of hero and heroine were admirably done from every standpoint. The singing as well as the histrionic grace of "one of America's foremost coloraturas" was a treat to this writer.

And the tenor "Una furtiva Lagrima" aria was very dramatic and carried off with great skill.

The other characters in the cast were equally interesting—Millo Picco was pompous and blustering, Daddi was the usual successful comedian, and Philine Falco was pleasing in the small part allotted to her.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

Thursday Afternoon

The children's program, which began at 3 o'clock, consisted of community singing, three dramatic dances by Ruth Frank, a pageant by the Junior Drama League, and the following orchestra program, exquisitely carried out by Mr. Hageman:

Overture Stradella ..... Flotow
Andante from Symphony No. 4 ..... Haydn
A Caucasian Sketch ..... Ippolitow-Ivanow
Ballet Suite ..... Tschaikowsky

The Caucasian Sketch, "In the Village," was the most popular number of this program. All the atmosphere possible was present in this very atmospheric piece, and the work of the solo violinist was worthy of special comment.

The pageant represented the triumph of peace, in whose train came happiness. The allied nations were personified in a striking manner, and various persons represented Peace, War, Sorrow, Justice, and, of course, old Father Time.

Miss Ruth Frank, a very young solo dancer, made her way straight into the hearts of her audience. Her lithe motions are a spectacle, her face a study in moods, and, moreover, she tells a story in each dance. In one she portrayed a girl bearing wine to a god and tempted, against her judgment, to taste it. Another dance told of the awakening of spring, another of the fortunes of a pretty Gypsy beggar. For one so young a remarkable depth of feeling and height of artistry were evinced, and it was interesting to see how completely the audience was carried along with her. A dancing child is indeed a lovely picture, and Thursday's treat will not soon be forgotten.

Thursday Evening

A repetition of "Tosca" brought to Ravinia one of the largest audiences of the week and intense enthusiasm for the colorful and highly musical Tosca of Florence Easton and the wonderfully fine Cavaradossi of Morgan Kingston.

This is a part in which the famous tenor excells signally, and the performances of which have brought him to a still higher plane in the esteem of Ravinia habitues.

Friday Afternoon

Soldiers and Sailors' Day has become so firmly fixed in the North Shore mind that each Friday afternoon sees a throng in attendance and witnesses also the greatest possible appreciation for the splendid programs of orchestra music provided by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Mr. Hageman.

The well chosen and beautifully played program of last Friday read as follows:

The Star Spangled Banner
March Triumphale ..... Borowski
Overture La Gazza Ladra ..... Rossini
Largo from The New World Symphony ..... Dvorak
Ballet Suite Coppelia ..... Delibes
Excerpts from Traviata ..... Verdi
Under the Linden Tree ..... Massenet
Duet for Cello and Clarinet .....

Saturday Evening

A repetition of "The Elixir of Love" brought one of the finest audiences of the season to Ravinia Park on Saturday evening.

It was blisteringly hot in the city, as you will well remember, but at Ravinia it was delightfully cool, and the huge audience enjoyed a performance which was top notch in cast and in rendition.

The old Donizetti opera is almost unknown to Chicagoans, although it has been in the repertoire of the Metropolitan in New York constantly because of the fact that Caruso loves to appear in it.

After seeing it on Saturday, one does not wonder at this preference of his, for the score allotted to tenor (Nemorino) is elaborate, musical, brilliant and logical.

Likewise the role of Annina, which is assigned to coloratura soprano, is one to conjure with, and as these two parts were excellently done at this time the effect was fine.

The part of Belcore suits Millo Picco to perfection, and he acted and sang with that same intelligence and musicianship which are rapidly making him an indispensable factor at Ravinia.

Miss Falco, a charming young singer, found in the part of Gionetta one very much suited to her gifts, and she presented it with style and finish.

Dr. Dulcamara is one of the best comedy parts ever put into an opera, and Daddi, of course, realized every iota of its unctuous humor.

Unfortunately, Donizetti assigned the character an elaborate vocal score which, on Saturday night, seemed quite beyond the present capacity of Mr. Daddi.

The "Elixir" is simple as to its scenic requirements and an al fresco setting is ideal for it, therefore it fitted into Ravinia Park so beautifully as to become a distinct charm.

The chorus has never done more intelligent acting or more musical singing, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra simply reveled in the lovely old score.

Gennaro Papi conducted with authority and distinction, and not only did he carry this opera to resounding success, but also did a like service on Tuesday for "Cavalleria," and on Thursday for "Tosca."

Bills of the Current Week

Besides the customary concerts of Sunday, Monday and Thursday, and that for Sailors and Soldiers this (Friday) afternoon, "Faust" was given on Sunday night, signalizing the return to Ravinia of Edith Mason. "Butterfly," with Easton and Kingston, was given on Tuesday evening, "La Boheme" on Wednesday, "Traviata" on Thursday.

There will be the usual Orchestra Concerts tonight and Saturday afternoon, with a repetition of the opera "Butterfly" on Saturday evening.

A PROGRAM STUDY CLASS

Beginning with the first week of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra programs, an Orchestra Program Study Class will be conducted by Lester W. Groom, which will meet on Saturday afternoons at 3:30 during the season. In these classes the symphonies, overtures, suites, etc., which the orchestra plays the same week, will be studied as to form, themes, and history, and at some of the sessions several of the orchestral instruments will be explained and played by able musicians.

Details can be obtained by telephoning Mr. Groom at Lincoln 8753.

MacFadyen—Florence Macbeth has announced her intention to include Alexander MacFadyen's new song, entitled "If" (published by the Oliver Ditson Company), on her program at the National American Musical Festival at Lockport, N. Y., in September. She has been singing this song everywhere, with great success. Another new song by MacFadyen is entitled "Confession," and is published by the John Church Company. He has just completed three new songs, "Homage to Spring," "Tonight," and "The Valley of Rest," which will be brought out in the near future.

AT THE LEILA BREED STUDIOS

On last Sunday evening Miss Breed invited her clientele to hear Rose Kuper sing an interesting program at her studio in the Fine Arts Building and the result was an hour of uncommon interest.

Mrs. Kuper makes an attractive picture on the stage—she is handsome and bright and her expressive face tells the story of her songs in unusually illuminative fashion.

Her voice is a rich dramatic soprano, with clear quality in the upper scale and produced throughout with ease and good effect.

Her musicianship is very good also—her enunciation of all texts excellent, and her general interpretative ability above the average.

All these assets were intensified and beautifully complemented in the artistic accompaniments afforded by Gavin Williamson.

A very special feature of the evening was a group of songs (Russian), sung in Yiddish and comprising a Russian Folk Song (Zimbalist), "Slumber Song" (Gretchaninoff), "Eili Eili" (Schindler), and "Tra-la-la" (Lefkowitch).

These were sung and interpreted with great skill and the effect on the audience was to arouse unusual enthusiasm for the special gifts of Mrs. Kuper which made them possible.

The program opened with two Old Italian arias, sung with smooth tone, delicate quality and nice enunciation of text, these being followed by a French group, in which the same things were in evidence, enhanced and made more brilliant through dramatic expression as the number required.

"Charmant Papillon" (Campra) was especially facile as well as scintillant in the Kuper presentation and "L'etoile" (Faure) was serene and steadfast in tonal quality and in musical climax.

The last group opened with two Old English songs, which, through clear enunciation of text and nice tonal coloring, became very charming.

Eckert's "Ay, more than bliss" made a nice impression also, while Carpenter's "The Cock Shall Crow," which closed the program, made a sensation by the clarity and brilliance with which it was presented.

ERIC DE LAMARTER

Eric De Lamarter, the popular and talented organist of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, who has made himself deeply felt in Chicago music circles during the past few years, gave his usual weekly organ recital last Thursday. Part of the program was heard by the writer, who was most favorably impressed, especially with the chorale prelude of Leo Sowerby, which was a difficult composition, built up in a most original and musicianly way.

The program is printed herewith:

Paean ..... Basil-Harwood
Chorale-Prelude (on a Melodic Fragment from a Palestrina Motet) ..... Leo Sowerby
Scherzo in D minor ..... Faulkes
Pastorale ..... Cesar Franck
Persian Suite ..... Stoughton
The Courts of Jamshyd

Saki
Evening Chimes ..... Wheeldon

Ricker—Bessie Bown Ricker, a favorite reader and child impersonator at Lockport, N. Y., who is at present still in France, is scheduled for appearance at the National American Musical Festival in September.

MARIO RUBINI

MARIO RUBINI A COMING OPERA STAR

Mario Rubini, although he was born in Trieste, somehow got to this country without seeing "Milanno" or, in fact, any part of "Italia," and with real Italian enthusiasm he is counting the days until he may visit that delectable place. He dreams of going there within a year and cherishes the prospect of hovering around La Scala to his heart's content. Meantime this elated young musician is working, and enjoying musical Chicago.

You would be elated, too, if you were a tenor lyrico-spirito and a protege of Raisa herself, and if you possessed autographed photos of Dolci and Pollaco, Raisa and Stracciari, all of whom believed in you and wished you the best of success. Life is worth living for Rubini.

Trevisan was his teacher, then Signor Dolci took him with him for several months on an opera tour, and three hours a day, when possible, were spent in coaching and study. During Dolci's absence (Covent Garden, London) Rubini is again studying with Trevisan. There are piano lessons, too, for he has set out to be an all-round musician. He is going to be prepared, when the time is ripe, to spring into a glorious heyday of lyrico-spirito—whatever that is—and there will be few to equal him. But first, Italia for a year.

Watch for him—Signor Mario Rubini.

The following facts have been given out concerning the coming opera season:

Tita Ruffo, baritone, will return to the company and will be heard in Chicago, New York and Boston. He has just returned to Italy from Mexico City by way of New York. Mr. Campanini expects him to be a greater favorite than ever. He will return to this country in November and will be heard in Leoncavallo's "Zaza" as well as his regular repertoire.

Much is expected of Tita Schipa, regarded by many critics in Europe and Latin America as the best lyric tenor that Italy has produced in years. Two other new members of the company who are more or less well known in this country, are Edward Johnson, tenor, and Carlo Galeffi, baritone. Mr. Schipa is now in Buenos Aires at the Teatro Colon, singing his third season in the Argentine capital. He will come here from South America. Born in Lecce in 1890, he studied music in the conservatory there and sang in the cathedral choir. Later he went to Milan. After two years' study there and in Florence he made his debut in "Traviata" in a small theater in south Italy. In the following season he made a tour of Italy, singing the general Italian repertoire. He then returned to Milan to the Dal Verme, then for six seasons he sang in Italy and Spain. In 1916 he went to Buenos Aires with Edward Johnson, Giovanni Martinelli and others.

Besides being a fine singer, Mr. Schipa is credited with being an excellent actor. He also is a thorough musician. He has composed church music and orchestral works. Last winter one of his symphonic works was played by the Madrid Symphony Orchestra, he conducting it. Later it was given, at the request of King Alfonso XIII, at the royal palace and the king gave the young artist a gold medal. Mr. Schipa's best operas are "Tosca," "Rigoletto," "Barber of Seville," "Traviata," "Manon," "I Puritani," "Elisir d'Amore" and "La Boheme."

Herbert M. Johnson, business controller of the Chicago Opera Association, who has just returned to Chicago from New York, announces that the annual autumn tour of the company will start on October 13 and will embrace Milwaukee, Peoria, St. Paul, Omaha, Kansas City, Oklahoma City, Fort Worth, Houston and Little Rock. The operas will be "Aida," with Miss Rosa Raisa, Alessandro Dolci, Miss Sophie Braslau, Georges Baklanoff, Constantin Nicolay and Virgilio Lazzaro; "La Boheme," with Alessandro Bonci, Mme. Alma Gluck, Miss Myrna Sharlow, Giacomo Rimini and others, and "Madame Butterfly," with Tamaki Miura, Forrest Lamont and Clarence Whitehill. Mr. Campanini will conduct all performances of "Aida." Miss Anna Ludmilla will be the premiere danseuse.

THE PRESS AT LARGE

In this division of Music News there will be printed, week by week, comments on various concerts and artists which have appeared in the daily and weekly press of the country. This is done in the belief that this matter will be found to be of great interest to a large number of people. This is in no sense an advertising department, and no items will be accepted for pay

"The Downfall of Aida"

This would be an appropriate title for the various attempts made in recent years to give "Aida" a really sumptuous production with disastrous results. After a fairly worthy production of this opera was given at the Greek Theater a short time ago, Mr. Hrubanik repeated the work at the Exposition Auditorium on Wednesday evening, July 2. The principal characters were: Aida, Maude Fay; Rhadames, Albert Rappaport; the King, Evaristo Alibertini; Amneris, Blanche Hamilton Fox; Amonasro, Marion Vecki; Ramphis, Giuseppe Corrallo; a Messenger, N. Personne; High Priestess, Emma Mesow Fitch; premiere danseuse, Frances Wakefield; musical director, Pietro Marino.

In reviewing a performance, whether it be concert or opera, we must take into consideration the character of the production. It must either have been a complete performance, or it must have been an unsatisfactory production. There is no middle way. It will not do to say that under the circumstances such and such was the case. Even though we feel that the soloists are entitled to recognition for the work they did, and the handicaps they worked under, we must maintain the dignity of a musical journal by refusing to give recognition to a performance of "Aida" without chorus, and without the most important spectacular accessories that help to make it such a splendid opera.

The fact is "Aida" was not presented and even though some of the artists showed pluck and ability we cannot grant them the satisfaction of a review, because the entire performance lacked professional atmosphere and artistic ensemble. The best we can do under the circumstances, and the most charitable act we can be expected to do, is to close the incident in silence. However, we cannot refrain from trusting that Mr. Hrubanik, no matter what excuses he may offer, is ashamed of himself for treating San Francisco opera lovers in such a slovenly manner as to give grand opera a "black eye" in this city. Under the cimcumstances the performance should not have been given at all, and the money should have been returned.—Pacific Coast Musical Review.

Remarkable Concert in Aurora

East High auditorium was packed Thursday afternoon by an audience composed of pupils and friends and music lovers in general who came to hear a most interesting program given by east side pupils, assisted by Miss Rosemary Pfaff, soloist, of Chicago.

Miss Margaret Pouk, supervisor of music in the east schools, is one of the most successful directors possible in that she not only teaches the best in music, but succeeds in getting an exquisite volume of the clear young voices, and best of all, a tone which is true to key. Particularly in two part music is it apparent that the pupils have been so trained as to know instinctively correct pitch.

The songs by the fifth and sixth grades, the sixth and seventh and the eighth grades were utterly charming—not the hit and miss so called "school songs," but the dainty and beautifully composed bits which grownups are glad to sing well. The rhythm was good and in this connection it can be said that much was added by the intelligent accompaniments furnished by Miss Florence Kelley. Miss Pouk and two of the teachers, Misses Benn O'Donnell and Catherine Ebersoll, led during the choruses.

Miss Rosemary Pfaff, a young girl just past 15 years of age, was extremely interesting. She is a sweet faced, blond headed little lady, who most certainly possesses a remarkable voice, which, it can be believed, will as the years go on develop into the really great voice found only now and then. It is apparently placed most naturally and the listener thought of the stories of Nellie Melba, who "never had to learn to trill." Rosemary has a most unaffected manner, and has apparently been taught wisely, for her singing is done with no apparent effort. She has also that which is not always true of the possessor of a fine voice—intelligence, and her phrasing was that of a far older woman. She sang "Pastorale," "Veracini" and "Villanelle" (Del 'Acqua), later facing the chorus upon the stage and singing that most trying of numbers, "Lo! Here the Gentle Lark" of Bishop, which all great sopranos attempt at one time or another.—Aurora Beacon-News.

She has a dramatic style of singing. She interpreted with intense dramatic feeling.—New York Herald.

Miss Olga Carrara, the vocalist, showed splendid resources in a large voice.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Her voice is remarkable for its freshness and beautiful quality. She gave "Caro mio ben," by Giordani, and Groossis' "Non temere" and "Quel laccio ch'umto" with intelligence and poetic taste.—New York American.

Winetzkaja in Recital

Following is some comment of the New York press:

A richly colored contralto voice used with judgment and effect. Really good contraltos are rare, and Miss Winetzkaja is one of them.—New York Herald.

Winetzkaja has a pleasing voice, temperament and comprehension of the songs she sings.—Sylvester Rawling, New York Evening World.

Mme. Winetzkaja is a mezzo-soprano of power, tenderness and much cultivation, and a considerable audience expressed great satisfaction with her singing.—New York Telegraph.

Mme. Winetzkaja's voice stood without difficulty on its own merits. It is of pleasurable quality and she is well aware of how best to use it. The evening's program she afforded was hence one to be grateful for. There was much well chosen music in it which she sang with great grace and nicety of feeling. Her mezzo voice exhibited a rounded warmth and a luscious quality.—New York Evening Sun.

Mme. Winetzkaja possesses a voice of warmth and color, which is an excellent medium for the publication of feeling. She displayed temperament and dramatic instincts in her singing, and was always interesting.—New York Sun.

Mme. Winetzkaja has a charming personality, a voice with much dramatic intensity in its full tones, and a graceful stage presence.—Katherine Lane, New York Evening Mail.

A good resonant mezzo-soprano, tending to the dramatic soprano color. The audience, which filled the room, discovered that they were in for an evening of artistic enjoyment.—H. E. Krehbiel, New York Tribune.

Maria Winetzkaja, a mezzo-soprano who has been heard here in opera, gave a song recital. Miss Winetzkaja has plenty of voice and feeling and is particularly at home in songs in her native Russian.—New York Evening Globe.

For the first time in an American concert one could feel the real Russian atmosphere, and this was due only to the wonderful singing of the Russian artist, Maria Winetzkaja.—New York Russky Golos (Russian Voice).

The Mandy School at Waukegan

Artistic quality in work and high standard in teaching was in evidence at the recital held last night at the parish house by the pupils of the Mandy School of Music, assisted by vocal pupils of Mrs. Mary Hotchkiss Love.

The outstanding feature of the program was the symphony by Hayden for four violins and piano played by Blenda Sterner, David Cohn, Marshall Meyer, Carl Linnemann and Frank Mandy. It was played with spirit and perfect ensemble and was very well received.

Special mention should be made of the playing of Blenda Sterner, Carl Linnemann, David Cohn, Millard Heyman and Marshall Meyer for their fine work, which was greatly enjoyed. Max Goodman, only six years old, impressed the audience with his good playing on his violin. The entire program was very good.—Waukegan Daily Gazette.

Hans Kronold

Hans Kronold played the cello in the most artistic manner.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

A soulful cellist is Kronold and the audience manifested high appreciation for his rendition.—Pittsburgh Post.

Perhaps the artistic triumph of the program was the cello playing of Hans Kronold, whose exquisite phrasing and fine feeling and expression make him an unusual artist.—Pittsburgh Gazette-Times.

His fine feeling and skilled musicianship mark him the artist.—Pittsburgh Sun.

Hans Kronold played beautifully on the cello and was forced to give a couple of encores.—Pittsburgh Press.

The celebrated cellist delighted music lovers with his finished playing.—Indianapolis Star.

Hans Kronold, a cellist of international note, is a real artist.—Indianapolis Daily Times.

A musical treat was afforded by Hans Kronold.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

By the sweetness of his tone and the sincerity of his performance he made a very favorable impression.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

He is a master of that full, exquisitely haunting quality of tone which this instrument gives under the hand of an artist.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

MARGUERITE RINGO TO SING AT LOCKPORT

Marguerite Ringo, New York soprano, who is to sing at the National American Music Festival at Lockport, N. Y., in September, will have on her program two very interesting new compositions, these being "Tristram and Isault," a fine dramatic number by Ad M. Foerster of Pittsburgh, and also a setting by him of "A Bedouin Love Song," the poem being by M. A. B. Evans of Lockport.

Miss Ringo will give a song recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on January 13.

On July 4 she had great success singing with the New York Military Band at Columbia University, presenting "The Americans Come" (Foster) and, for encore, "Love's in My Heart" (Woodman).

On the 17th she appeared in a Globe concert in New York, giving songs in English and Russian and including the Waltz from "Romeo and Juliet" (Gounod).

On the 30th she sang at the Yacht Club in Rockaway, and on the 31st gave a private recital in New York.

THEODORE HARRISON

The important announcement is now given out that Theodore Harrison, for five years head of the voice department of the University School of Music, Ann Arbor, Mich., has been secured by the Lyceum Arts Conservatory, Lyon & Healy Building, Chicago, as voice teacher and director of the music department. Mr. Harrison is recognized as one of the leading voice teachers of the country. Frank A. Morgan, the manager of the school, states that he and Elias Day, director of the school, each visited Mr. Harrison more than two years ago to undertake to persuade him to come to Chicago, but at that time Mr. Harrison did not feel that he could make the change. However, they continued their efforts, and Mr. Harrison signed the contract with them in May to take up his work in the Lyon & Healy Building at the opening of the seventh year of the conservatory, but did not wish the announcement of his decision to be made until the present time.

THEODORE HARRISON

Mr. Harrison will be an important acquisition to the musical activities of Chicago, and his many friends bid him welcome. Some of the leading singers of Chicago have studied with Mr. Harrison in Ann Arbor. He has filled many important engagements as soloist with orchestras, oratorio societies and other organizations.

Elias Day will continue as general director of the varied activities of the school, the organizing of concert companies which are coached by Mr. Day being an important feature of their work. This conservatory has been making fine progress, and with Theodore Harrison as the new director of the music department the outlook is most promising.

WAR CAMP COMMUNITY SERVICE

As an effort to relieve to a certain extent the increased demand for community song leaders—an outgrowth of the war emergency—the War Camp Community Service is to inaugurate in New York on August 1 a training school for volunteer leaders and accompanists. The purpose is to provide the various organizations, stores, factories, etc., with the means of carrying on, without outside assistance, the community singing which they initiated during the war. The course of training, which will be given without fee, will be conducted on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings from August 1 to August 22. The place of meeting has not yet been determined. A large number of registrations for the course have already been received by the Department of Community Singing, W. C. C. S., 15 East Fortieth street, New York City.

This action has been taken by the W. C. C. S. to supplement the work of its community organizers of singing, who in their task of instituting the singing among the various groups in a community have been held back by the insufficient number of qualified local leaders. The scheme of the present school is that the different groups are to select from among their members persons who may be adapted for the work, with the idea of equipping as leaders those who prove especially gifted along that line, thus making the group independent of outside help as to leadership. The training is also designed with a view to giving the most talented candidates a preliminary schooling for a place in this new profession, though this phase is not emphasized by the organizers.

The candidates will be given the practical ground work of the essentials of leading community singing, and each session will include talks by recognized leaders in the movement—talks which shall give the vision of the future of community singing in America. Among the speakers will be Dr. O. F. Lewis, Lee F. Hammer, Robert Lawrence, Harry Barnhart, W. C. Bradford, Frank E. Slyde, F. J. Tyler and Kenneth S. Clark. The class training is to be in the hands of W. W. Norton and Frank E. Hayek, while the supervision of the accompanists will be in charge of Frederick Hall.

Similar schools are to be started by the W. C. C. S. in various important centers.

DEEP BASS, TRANSFORMED TO BARITONE, AMAZES AUDIENCE

With this striking headline, Herman Devries of the Chicago Evening American goes on to say:

"I doubt if there could be a better Scarpia than Leon Rothier. In fact, the performance of "Tosca" seems to have been staged to bring out the glittering vocal and histrionic talents of this prize product of French operatic training and tradition.

"We have been used to hearing Mr. Rothier in his official and registered capacity of bass-baritone, and we have marveled at the carrying power and resonance of his low E's. But on Saturday night the bass was transformed into a baritone who could live in the rarified atmosphere of high F's with equal ease.

"Rothier's voice in the Scarpia music was glorious—there is no word but this—and if the praise is generous the cause is genuine.

"All the technical accomplishments of singing were readily exhibited by Mr. Rothier's obedient organ, and the quality of mezza-voce he produced was like the touch of velvet."

Jacques Thibaud Plays at Spalding's Wedding

On the occasion of Albert Spalding's wedding to Miss Mary Vanderhoef Pyle, Jacques Thibaud, a lifelong friend of our American genius, played for his colleague at Ridgefield, Conn. It was not a wedding march that Jacques Thibaud played, but genuine classics, and in a fashion to arouse the enthusiasm of bride, bridegroom and guests. Andre Benoist, the accompanist of Spalding's pre-war days, also rendered several pieces. Albert Spalding with his wife left for a trip through New England, and will return in August to Monmouth Beach, N. J., to divide his time between vacation joys and practice on his violin.

The Rialto

This movie music house has furnished our opera houses some excellent singers, which means that Mr. Riesenfeld's ears have always selected some of the best vocalists for his patrons. The magnates induced certain soloists to desert the movie for the opera house. That's how Jeanne Gordon was engaged for the next Metropolitan season. Another example of happy choice was Mr. Riesenfeld's engagement of Miss Athens Buckley, a Canadian mezzo-soprano, for the week ending July 27. Miss Buckley is a pupil of Paul Morenzo, and proved her teacher's efficiency as a genuine and legitimate pedagogue. Miss Buckley's voice was shown to advantage in the rendition of the "Suicidio," from "La Gioconda" (Ponchielli). With exception of rare off-pitch singing, the aria was given an effective interpretation. I would not be surprised if, some day, a discriminating impresario robs the Rialto of this excellent singer.

The orchestra rendered Ambroise Thomas' overture, "Raymond." It was conducted ably by Nat Finston. Greek Evans, baritone, sang "In the Garden of My Heart" (Ernest Ball).

When will the management spare us of the nonsensical and absurd Sunshine Comedies? George C. Crook played on the organ Scherzo from Sonata in E Minor (James Rogers). "Sari" (Kalman) was the most popular offering executed by the orchestra.

J. De V.

The Strand

Carl Edouarde conducted the orchestra, which rendered excerpts from "Carmen." The interesting feature of the program was Walter Pontius, a tenor from Philadelphia. His voice and style of singing remind one of John McCormack, with only one exception—the tenor is not as expressive and animated as the genial Irish tenor. After singing a song he granted an encore consisting of "Just a Little Bit of Heaven," in which McCormack has no rival. Dorothy South was the soprano soloist. The accredited organist was at his post.

Daughter of P. A. Tirindelli to Sing in "Chu Chin Chow"

Enrico Caruso's recommendation may have helped to secure for Miss Tirindelli, a young lady of twenty, an engagement for the performances of "Chu Chin Chow" to be given at the New Century Theater, beginning the month of August, but her voice was the prime factor for her engagement, which was tendered to her by Morris Gest, the impresario of New York. Miss Tirindelli comes from a musical family. Her father was formerly connected with the Cincinnati Conservatory, as head of the Violin Department. He is also an excellent composer. Mr. Tirindelli is established in New York, where he is expected to teach advanced pupils.

"She Is a Good Fellow" at the Globe

The libretto of Anne Caldwell has nothing in common either with the music or anything else. Miss Caldwell wrote it, but only once did I find any reference to the title, and it meant little to the development of the comedy. I couldn't understand why Robert McLane objected to marrying Jacquilline. If I go again the puzzle will puzzle me more. Jerome Kern wrote some charming music, especially "Some Party" delighted the ears. It was a welcome relief to listen to pleasing tunes, and more to have the drums and the brass instruments spared us, as Mr. Kern wrote the quiet, "sweet," melodious strains; in fact, a score superior to the lyrics and books. Ann Orr, in spite of a poor voice, was delightful in action of the vivacious nature. The Duncan Sisters were excellent in their songs and semi-pantomime movements. I preferred Joseph Santley, as Pepita, more than in the balance of his work. Robert J. Higgins and Scott Welsh contributed with some fun.

HENRY B. RONEY

Henry B. Roney will have charge of the selection of singers and players for the "Informal Hour" daily at 4 o'clock at the annual convention of the International Lyceum and Chautauqua Association at the La Salle Hotel September 14 to 19. The object of this hour is to give singers, players, concert companies, pianists, violinists and other instrumentalists an opportunity to be heard by the assembled managers of bureaus, Chautauquas, and lecture courses, with the view to engagements.

This will be a rare chance for young singers and players of real talent and achievement to appear before a large number of managers in a fine hall with fine piano, under the best possible auspices. People are coming from all over the United States, even as far as California, to compete for a chance to enter the ranks of the professionals, and the contests will be intensely interesting.

Mr. Roney desires to give a personal hearing to all applicants not known to him before agreeing to place them on the program, and also promises to play the accompaniments of all young artists who desire it who are not otherwise provided for. The selections must be purely musical and of a high order. Vaudeville "stunts" will not be entertained. Applications should be made at once to Henry B. Roney, 1021 Leland avenue, Chicago. Telephone Sunnyside 6912.

Nakutin—Alexander Nakutin, Russian tenor, will appear in October in a number of characteristic recitals. His Kimball Hall studio will remain open all Summer for the benefit of the large class of singers who wish to continue lessons during that time.

Ffrench—Mr. and Mrs. Burton C. Lester (nee Miss Florence Ffrench) will live in Casper, Wyo.

MARIO SALVINI GIVES A DINNER PARTY TO PUPIL DEBUTANT

Not even the ten days' rain could mar the little, festive dinner tendered to Mr. Green by his excellent vocal teacher—the sympathetic Mario Salvini.

We assembled by invitation at one of the Latin restaurants and we enjoyed the special menu arranged by the teacher, who is also an expert culinary judge. We were, naturally, in good humor, but young Green and his tutor were the happiest. By the way, this young chap is a Wisconsin boy, who come to New York to recommence his vocal studies, interrupted by his enlistment in the navy. His progress took unusual strides, until his tenor voice became, indeed, eligible for professional work.

As soon as the boy proved efficient, he was offered a flattering engagement, accepted it, and by the time this appears in our columns he will be delighting the Middle West audiences. Some weeks have elapsed since he was heard at a public recital given at the Wanamaker auditorium, in New York, and the writer observed his splendid qualifications for a public career. Now an engagement has been accomplished and the young man is happy and his teacher is justly proud of him.

After the dinner we retired to Mr. Salvini's studio and there enjoyed a little concert. After the rendition of "Una furtiva lagrima," from "L'Elisir d'Amore" (Donizetti), young Green received showers of appreciation from the guests.

Mr. Green is the possessor of a light tenor voice, but it has the power of carrying far into the depths of a musical room. In quality one can easily say it is unusually beautiful. The production of the voice exhibits superb teaching. His aria was immensely enjoyed and, then, encores piled up in countless numbers.

A new recruit of Mr. Salvini's studio gave us further delights of singing as well as of dancing. I am speaking of Miss Nella Joy Richards. The young lady, upon whom nature has bestowed physical qualities of fascination and charm, gave a splendid exhibition of terpsichorean dances, delightfully interpreted, and concluded her part of the program with the rendition of several songs. I am quite certain that, under her present capable tutelage, she will succeed in becoming a double artist, i. e., singer-dancer. Mr. Salvini, in spite of the rain, came from his country home at Edgemere, Long Island, to tender his tribute to a pupil who is to try his wings in the concert field. There were several prominent guests, but to enumerate the names would occupy too much space. I noted Mr. Driggs, the editor of the Musical Advance; Mr. Pierre Scoglio, representing the Secolo of Milan and the Tribuna of Rome, and several others.

AUGUSTA COTTLOW MAKES A CORRECTION

An erroneous impression seems to have become prevalent that Augusta Cottlow, the well-known American pianist, was married in Berlin to a German. Miss Cottlow wishes to correct this by stating that her husband, Edgar A. Gerst, is a Californian, was born in Livermore, California, and lived the greater part of his life in San Francisco.

Miss Cottlow first met her husband during her prodigy days on her first tour of the Pacific Coast. Later they met again when he was traveling abroad with his father on the night of her first concert with orchestra in Berlin. After a lapse of several years they met again in Frankfort on the Main, where Miss Cottlow was giving a recital and where Mr. Gerst was studying singing. This was in 1910. In 1911 they became engaged and in 1912 were married in New York City, at the Hotel Laurelton, where Miss Cottlow and her mother were then residing.

Both Miss Cottlow and her husband, Mr. Gerst, are loyal Americans, and the latter proved his patriotism by going into the shipyards of his native State of California and working there until the close of the war.

Miss Cottlow hopes that this will forever silence the rumors that have been afloat regarding her husband's nationality and the place of their marriage.

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

By ELIZABETH FORESMAN BAGG

PART V

CHAPTER 6

Faults and Their Remedies

In this chapter I am trying to indicate a few of the faults toward which a young singer is apt to incline, suggesting the remedy, and also the punishment, which in this work usually fits the crime. For in perhaps no other art is it so perilous to go astray as in that of vocal music, for this reason: the resulting trouble is so apt to be physical. And while the cure for this trouble is in most cases possible, the chances are very much against the singer's falling, at just the right time, into the hands of the person who may understand how to handle it.

For instance, a young pianist may follow a poor method of study for a year or two, and then, upon realizing her mistake, set to work in the right direction, with no more serious loss than that of time and money. But the young singer who is unfortunate in her choice of method faces not only the loss of time and money, but the possibility of a condition of throat that may necessitate the most skillful treatment in order that the singing voice may not be permanently lost.

This is why parents cannot be too careful in their choice of the first teacher. We so often hear it said: "Oh, Mary Jones will do for the child to begin with, until we find out whether she has a voice or not. Then, later on, we can send her to a really good teacher." Now, in some cases, this plan may work out. Mary Jones may know more about voice culture than she seems to, or she may realize her shortcomings and proceed so cautiously that she does little damage; or, again, she may be lucky and have to deal only with voices that are naturally well placed, and whose owners do not happen to stray from the straight and narrow path. But when you consider that, on the other hand, the inexperience or lack of knowledge of Mary Jones is perfectly able to bring on throat conditions requiring months to cure, I think you will agree with me that if ever an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure it is in the department of vocal music.

As an instance of the inconsequence with which many people approach the choice of a teacher, a successful pianist told me one day of her early efforts along the line of singing. She said, "You see, I lived in a small town where there were just two vocal teachers, both of them very good friends of mine. I didn't want to offend either by studying with the other, so I took lessons from both of them at the same time. As each had a quite different theory of singing from the other, my own ideas became so involved that I finally gave up vocal music and turned to the piano."

Of course it is easier to say "Choose only a good teacher for your child" than it is to do it. As in the case of a physician, it is not invariably the one with the greatest reputation who is the safest choice. Still, while acknowledging the difficulty for a layman in choosing a wise teacher, one must admit that it is not impossible. One can, by listening to pupils, and by taking the advice of those who know something of the study and the studio, often make a successful choice.

It is no fairer, to be sure, to judge the teacher by one or two pupils, good or bad, than to judge the physician by one or more cures or failures to cure. All teachers have failures which should not be laid at their doors, as well as successes in which they can claim little part. But I think that no honest teacher will fear to be judged by his class as a whole. Careful listening to a class, all of whom are working under one leadership, is bound to bring out this fact—providing the teacher is following the right method; a majority of these pupils, although in different stages of development, should give evidence of an understanding of the main principles of voice culture, and of an effort at least to go in the right direction in spite of individual faults.

In a recital of a dozen pupils of one teacher one expects faults in each pupil. This is normal—otherwise they would be artists and not pupils. One does not, however, expect to find the same fault in all the pupils. When this is the case something is wrong. When you hear twelve pupils singing off the key, or twelve pupils employing imperfect breath control, or twelve pupils with voices which have no carrying power in the middle register, it is safe to say that the teacher of the unhappy twelve has, to say the least, extremely sketchy ideas of the particular principle that the twelve are violating, and is, therefore, not a safe guide. The principles of correct singing are not many or difficult, and no teacher who does not thoroughly understand them, or who has not the ability to impart them to a majority of his pupils, has the right to practice the profession of an instructor of vocal music. He is not only a faker, but a very dangerous malpractitioner.

When I speak of the principles of vocal culture I do not mean either the anatomical structure of the throat or the art of interpretation; I mean those three fundamental, underlying rules of voice work which we have studied under the names of Breath Control, Voice Placing, and Voice Building. These existed in the minds of vocal teachers long before the laryngescope laid bare the truth that underlies them. Upon these three great principles rests the Law and the Prophets as far as the science of voice culture is concerned.

As for interpretation, if I may touch upon it without encroaching upon a succeeding chapter, let me say this: Many teachers who are splendid "coaches," who have the traditions of opera, oratorio, and lieder at their finger tips, are not safe exponents of the rudimentary principles of which we speak, and should only be trusted with the voice which has been carefully grounded along these lines.

Now to mention a few of these faults which crop out in so many voices, and which, unless understood and corrected in their early stages, may become barriers to one's successful career. Let us begin with False Pitch, because it is perhaps the fault which is most obvious to the person who is not educated in music. It requires a certain amount of knowledge of voice culture to detect bad control of the breath, or a poorly placed tone, but so many of the laity have a correct ear for music that a deviation from pitch does not usually pass undetected.

It is not correct, in a majority of cases, to lay the blame of singing off the key to a poor ear on the part of the singer. Even in these days of increased study of music very few people who are what we call "tone deaf" make the effort to sing. Even of those who have what we might call a "careless ear" there is only a small percentage among students. The majority of people who sing off the key do so because of bad voice production. This is perhaps fortunate, as the case of the pupil who sings off the key from this cause is much more easily reached and helped than that of the one who has not a musical ear.

I have had many cases of pupils in whom I have had to correct a tendency to sing "flat" in that portion of the voice in which the change is made from the medium to the head register; and I have found that the cause lay largely in the fact that the pupil had not placed the tone high enough to begin with, and had then allowed it to fall back into the throat—had flattened it, instead of arching it—in other words, had failed to place it high enough in the head register. Sometimes she was conscious of it, knew that she was singing off the key, and sometimes she was too much absorbed in the difficulty of tone placement to hear its falseness; but in either case the remedy was the same. A tone that is correctly placed, arched, supported by the breath, will not be off the key.

Overproduction of tone is often the cause of singing "sharp." The pupil thinks too high. Her mental placement of the tone overreaches—we might say, overproduces it. Such a tone must be deepened, expanded, put "on the breath." The pupil must be told to think lower and so the tone which was sharp becomes a rounded and beautiful note. As you see, we are constantly returning to the three principles—the Rule of Three, we might call it, of voice culture.

As it happens, this vocal vice is not entirely restricted to the young and ignorant. We are conscious sometimes with a horrid shock that this or that person who we know to be a good singer, an artist of standing, perhaps a teacher, has just sung a note off the pitch! We are offended and hurt. We want to know why he does it. His other singing has shown that he understands the placement and use of the voice, so why should he—a veteran—commit this schoolboy error of singing off the key?

The reason is pure carelessness. He is too sure of himself and does not use the care in the placing of every note that should have become second nature to him. Or, possibly, his attention has been engrossed by something difficult in a preceding passage and he has not used his mentality on the easy note, but has allowed it to go its own way. He is like the old trail horse who carefully and safely comes down the hair-raising part of the trail and then allows himself to stumble as much as he likes on level ground.

Often the incorrect pronunciation of a vowel sound will throw a note off the pitch. "Past" with the flat "A" instead of the broad "A" will sometimes produce the note that falls below the pitch. We find also that to flat is a more common fault than to sharp. So we see that singing off the key is more apt to be the result of mistaken mentality and consequent bad tone production than of an ear that is at fault.

There are cases, however, where the ear is the cause of this trouble, and they are not easy cases to remedy. These cases are few, I believe, in the musical world, because this defect which we commonly hear spoken of as "not being able to carry a tune" is usually discovered early in life and the victim is not encouraged to pursue music as a career.

I have had two pupils, both young men, whom I was able to cure of this trouble. I patiently set to work and educated the reluctant ear, accustoming it to the different tone pitches by carefully playing every note over and over, making the boy listen attentively before forming his idea of the tone, and stopping him at every deviation from pitch. Both of these young men had good voices and both learned to sing acceptably during their college years. Just how far they might have been able to carry this progress I cannot say, as neither of them made music his profession. It is natural, of course, that very few of these people should choose a profession which is hedged about for them with so many difficulties. I believe, however, that except in the very worst cases the ear can be educated to correct pitch.

Another dangerous fault which sometimes has to be reckoned with in pupils is the stroke of the glottis. You will remember that in a previous chapter, in speaking of the use of the vowel "E" in practice, we said that with many pupils it was necessary to put before the "E" the sound of "C," making "CE" in order to avoid an attack. This attack, or stroke of the glottis, is most harmful in its effects. Dr. Holbrook Curtis, the famous throat specialist, says of it:

"The shock or coup de glotte is death to the voice; it is born of ignorance, and to teach or allow its continuance is a crime. We have no words strong enough to properly condemn it. Having seen the dire effects upon many pupils of those who advise it, are we not justified in considering its advocates parties to either gross ignorance or atrocious malpractice?" This at-

ASTOLFO PESCIA-OLGA CARRARA

The season of 1919-20 will disclose a surprise for music lovers. After an absence from the professional field Olga Carrara, one of the foremost sopranos of the day, will re-enter the musical field, and by sheer force of her splendid voice she is bound to capture the hearts of the music lovers. In the near future we will be able to comment extensively on this soprano, whose qualifications entitle her to a worthy place in our two prominent opera houses.

Arnold Volpe, the conductor of the Stadium concerts, when he heard her at a private audition immediately engaged her to appear as soloist at the Stadium on Friday evening, August 22. She is a native of Florence, the city which witnessed the birth of Luisa Tetrazzini; came to America in 1916 after a very successful career in the Italian opera houses.

Ever since her arrival she has coached with Astolfo Pescia, the famous New York vocal teacher.

The young master has just received the joyous announcement that a pupil of his, Pasquale Rippa, a young Italian basso, has conquered his countrymen when appearing at the Naples Opera House.

At a recent matinee musicale Mr. Pescia presented his pupils in a very enjoyable audition. Those who proved that their studies are not in vain were the recipients of admiration from the listeners. Special note should be made of the following: Jeannette Van Euchen, Miss Laurie, both sopranos; Miss Carpenter, Miss Schmid, Marguerite Cameron, Mrs. Blum, mezzo-sopranos, and Mr. Grunberg, baritone. Every one of them showed vocal efficiency, and through hard studies they are bound to attain the desired results.

Olga Carrara to Sing Aida at the Stadium

The management of the Stadium concerts does not spare any efforts to make their offerings most interesting for those who prefer New York to the seashore. A remarkable event is announced for Tuesday evening, August 5, when a special performance of "Aida" is contemplated by the management.

For this event Signora Olga Carrara, a soprano with an enviable European reputation, will appear by special engagement. She will interpret the role of the Ethiopian slave in a manner which will be a surprising feature to the music lovers. Since her arrival in America some three years ago she has been studying constantly with Chevalier Astolfo Pescia. This will be her first important appearance in New York.

Olga Carrara was born at Florence, Italy. Before extolling her operatic successes it will be necessary to add that she possesses a soprano voice, "lyric-dramatic," of unsurpassed beauty, ductile, and her method of singing is complete, artistic and irreproachable.

Though young in years, Olga Carrara has already made operatic conquests in her own country. She made her debut as Amelia in "The Masked Ball," achieving a veritable triumph. Following her unusual success she was immediately engaged to appear in various roles. At the Mercadante and Bellini theaters she created a furore as Leonora in "Trovatore," in "Fedora" (Giordano) and as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana." At the Verdi of Padova her interpretation of Fiora in "L'Amore dei Tre Re" (Montemezzi) was the greatest event in the history of that theater. Her success crossed the borders of Spain. The Teatro Reale of Madrid, the most famous of the Iberian opera houses, engaged her to especially interpret Wagnerian parts, and in them she duplicated her artistic feats of the Latin repertory.

She created a sensation as Siglinda in "Valkyrie" and in subsequent Wagnerian roles she took the Spaniards by storm. Of her singing in "The Dusk of the Gods" and "The Rhine Gold" the Spanish press bestowed upon her unusual comments. Following her Madrid triumphs Italy claimed her again, and immediately after her return she sang Aida at the Politeama Verdi in her native city.

In 1916 she went to New York and devoted her time between studies and occasional appearances. On April 4, 1916, she appeared at Carnegie Hall. On March 2, 1918, she sang at Aeolian Hall. She has many important engagements for the season of 1919-1920.

PAUL MORENZO

Paul Morenzo is telling an interesting experience which he had several years ago in Paris. He was then singing in opera, but during the summer vacation he stored all his valuable belongings, including books, paintings, press clippings, etc., together with his costumes, in one of the storehouses across the Seine. It was at the time of the big flood, when the Seine rose over all the bridges, and the officials of the health department, fearing an epidemic, confiscated everything which was damaged from the water. Everything was burned up, and nobody cared what treasures had been lost. In Mr. Morenzo's trunk were some photographs which can never be replaced, as they were copies of oil paintings from his grandfather, who was a famous portrait painter.

Mr. Morenzo gave an interesting story of these experiences to a newspaper friend, relating an incident which happened at that same time, several years before the war. He was engaged to sing at the special celebration concert on Bastile Day at St. Cloud on July 14th, when he sang the "Love Song" from Wagner's "Walkure" in French, which he had just heard a week previous to that occasion, given by his famous colleague, Van Dyke, who sang the same opera, "Walkure," in French at the Paris Opera.

RAYMOND BURKHOLDER, President

KANKAKEE, ILL.

The commencement exercises of the Metropolitan School were given last Thursday evening before a large, enthusiastic audience, members of the faculty furnishing the musical numbers.

Jeannette Peterson, pianist, opened the program with the Italian Concerto by Bach, in which she was clear and definite, as well as scholarly in interpretation.

Kenneth Rayer, a talented violinist, played the Mozart Sonata in E Minor with rich, full and sympathetic tones, and gave evidence of a sincere appreciation of the style of the classic master. Mr. Rayer was very musical in the "Kol Nedri" and invested it with feeling akin to the religious fervor of the Hebrew.

Stanley Wilkinson, the popular tenor, sang three selections well suited to his voice and ability. His is a well-trained voice, and he uses it with skill and musicianship.

Mrs. O. H. Hold, a graduate of the American Conservatory, played the Liszt Rhapsody with brilliance and precision and a nice conception of dynamic values. Her performance was very enjoyable, and she was wholly temperamental in unfolding the various moods of the rhapsody.

Alice Corcoran closed the program with the Etude in D Flat, by Liszt. She skillfully and expressively conserved the melodic lines, but infused the accompaniment with just enough vigor to give it life, but yet always in subordination to the melody.

Helen Hawk furnished the accompaniments in artistic and sympathetic manner, and was a worthy coworker with the soloists.

Misses Peterson and Corcoran and Mrs. Hold are pupils of Theodore Militzer, Mr. Wilkinson of Dr. Carver Williams, and Mr. Rayer of Ralph Michaelis and Herbert Butler. The performers were all definite and excellent examples of the high standards of these eminent instructors and of the school with which they are connected.

Dana—Lynn B. Dana, president of the Dana Musical Institute at Warren, Ohio, will deliver an address at the Lockport (N. Y.) convention in September.

OTTO KAHN A FAMOUS PATRON OF MUSICAL ART

Otto H. Kahn, chairman of the committee in charge of the reception to the Saint Cecilia Orchestra from Rome, which is to make an American tour following a gala premiere at the Metropolitan Opera House in October, is the foremost patron of music and dramatic art in the United States. His artistic associations have been with the most brilliant and successful musical organizations in the world, including the Metropolitan, of which he is Chairman of the Board; Covent Garden, in London; the Chicago, and the late Boston companies. Last year he was decorated by the French government for his interest in French art. He was chairman of the committee which brought to the United States the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, with Andre Messager wielding the baton, and a group of French artists which contributed largely to the success of last year as a season of musical excellence. The associates of Mr. Kahn on the committee to receive the Saint Cecilia Orchestra is an indication of the importance of the event. This group includes Frederick G. Bourne, Andre de Coppet, Henry P. Davison, Henry C. Frick, Robert Goelet, Myron T. Herrick, Clarance H. Mackay, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Charles H. Sabin, William K. Vanderbilt, Henry Walters, and George W. Wickersham.

SIMPLICITY IN SINGING

tack can be felt at the back of the throat. Try it, as we have said, with the vowel "E," and then changing it to "CE" note the freedom and comfort of voice that is gained.

In my own teaching I have always held persistently to the thought that the throat is merely a tube for the tone to come through and that it must come through freely, comfortably, clearly, and without undue force or tension. This is not in any sense a denial of the scientific procedure of the various parts of the throat, such as the glottis, epiglottis, larynx, pharynx, etc.; it is merely a realization that for the purposes of rudimentary vocal teaching—that is, correct respiration, voice placing, etc.—discussion of these operations is harmful rather than helpful. Let the teacher read and study them if he wishes to, but let him be very careful how he confuses the mind of the pupil with them to the detriment of the absolutely essential principles of the art of singing, which can be and are taught with very slight reference to the physical formation of the vocal organs.

I do not wish to give very much space to the enumeration of possible faults, as I believe that more can be gained by a positive than by a negative outline of work; by a discussion of right ways of doing things rather than too much warning against wrong ones. Still, there are faults that are so universal that it is only sensible to mention them for the benefit of those who may be struggling along this sometimes bewildering path without a guide.

I have found it a tendency, for instance, with many pupils to neglect the use of the expanded tone in the upper or head voice; in other words, to let that part of the voice "sing itself." These pupils are usually young girls who, owing to naturally good voices and no unfortunate experience in study, have accomplished good results with comparatively little labor.

One girl, a particularly gifted student, always came back to me after an absence from study, with the voice itself in good condition, but with this lazy, inefficient manner of handling the head tones. Each time I would have to convince her that she was allowing her upper voice, in all but her pianissimo tones, to become dull and colorless and without resonance. It was so easy for her to sing high notes that she would not use her mental energy for the production of an expanded tone.

Another pupil, studying with me at the same time, illustrated the reverse case. She had lived in small towns where she had seldom been able to study, and with her progress had been the result of very hard work and persistence. When her voice began to develop and to show these brilliant upper tones, and when she realized exactly how the action of the expanded tone was adding richness and fullness to her head voice, she was so delighted that I seldom had to recall it to her mind. She COULD not forget anything that was to her so wonderful. This expanded tone, it must be remembered, not only gives these qualities of fullness and richness to the voice, but it helps to keep in it the charm of youth and freshness, and does away with tension and fatigue.

In the contralto voice we sometimes have to combat a natural somberness of tone; in which case we must brighten it by various expedients. Clear enunciation, bringing the voice to the teeth, will do this; also the choice of bright, lively music for practice. This natural somberness is not to be confused with that artificial "hollowness" which is heard in the voices of many contraltos, who carry the medium voice down into the chest register, thus doing away entirely with the chest notes, and who allow the breath to come through these medium tones with a hollow and owl-like sound. This, of course, entirely kills the beautiful warmth of tone that belongs by nature to the lower register of the contralto voice.

It is a good idea for a young singer to do much of her practicing before the looking glass, as she can see clearly many things which otherwise escape her attention. She must, for instance, note that her mouth is opened as it should be. So many girls, for some peculiar reason, fail to open their mouths sufficiently when they sing, yet how can you expect a full, round, high note to issue from a half-closed mouth? There are also stubborn chins which their owners are inclined to grip and clinch, and which make a free, pleasing note quite impossible. I have often found that this mirror practice has helped to loosen a rigid chin and so get rid of this obstacle to progress. Occasionally an obstinate tongue will insist upon rolling itself into an impediment to the clearness of the tone, and must be flattened and brought to touch gently the lower front teeth.

There is, too, that bugbear to many—the tremolo. This must not be confused with the proper and necessary vibration of the tone. I believe that with a firm expansion of the tone one can hold the voice steady and retain the vibration, while banishing the tremolo. The tremolo is apt to be the result of trying for strength with the throat.

I suppose that the most important thing about faults is to realize that we have them. To this end it is well for the pupil to hear good singing whenever she possibly can, that she may have before her good models from which to judge her own work. Fortunately, nowadays, there are comparatively few towns so small and so unimportant that they are not included in the concert tours of some of the many good singers who are before the public, thus making it possible for the student who cannot go to the musical centers to benefit occasionally from the hearing of good music.

Vol. 11 Chicago, August 8, 1919 No. 32

"There's a Divinity That Shapes Our Ends Rough—Hew Them How We Will!"—

Thus the familiar quotation was set up by the inspired compositor and thus we will let it remain—for a few moments. For surely the Divinity of the Times is shaping our "ends" exceedingly "rough."

* * * * * * * *

The war, with its endless chain of unpleasant after-results, especially to musicians—the blimp disaster and the horrible crime of the moron, Fitzgerald, have upset our mental equilibrium.

And then the disquieting race riots, a blot on civilization and a special disgrace to Chicago—although almost all other cities have had a taste of the same disagreeable medicine.

And first, last and all the time, the H. C. of L., which even Our President has finally concluded to be at the root of all social and political unrest and which is directly responsible for the exceedingly trying street car strike we have just weathered in Chicago and for the general railroad strike which seems to be in the offing.

* * * * * * * *

And all these things have had their decidedly unpleasant effects upon musicians just the same as on other people, and in many ways they have affected musicians more than almost any other class of people.

For, as often pointed out, every political and social upheaval, every disaster which occupies acute attention, invariably reacts against the arts and all the finer points of living.

Thus, the last week of the Summer Schools was somewhat curtailed in magnificence through the fact of the street car strikes—the final concerts of the teaching season did not receive quite so much attention as did those of earlier July, and the booking of lessons and of concerts for the coming year received a little set-back.

* * * * * * * *

But this will not be for long. The Public has shown, absolutely, that it can do without street cars if necessary, and has put a check upon unreasonable demands.

The railroad strike, if it comes, will be over even more promptly than was the street car strike, and as for the other disturbances and disasters, surely we have had about all that can be piled into one Century, and it may be hoped that Normality will again come to the fore with the passing of this uproarious Summer.

And, just as fast as normal times can be established—just as rapidly as the H. C. of L. can be brought under control—just that inevitable will be the revival in music and the other arts which has been hovering in the air the past several months.

People all over the country have shown a decided leaning toward study, and especially music study. The concert field has never looked so promising as for the coming season.

* * * * * * * *

The Music World has its own problems to settle, some of these growing out of the war and all of them being the direct result of the changing times in all other lines of endeavor. We must Democratize music and bring it home to the people—we must thoroughly Americanize it and show the World that our own music is as good as any in the World and, for us, the Best.

And, we must not forget for a moment that the music profession must be put on a much better Commercial basis than ever before. Musicians must study economics, they must learn to appraise their own values properly, they must learn co-operation, and they must defend themselves not only from every form of Foreign aggression but also from their own countrymen who have not yet learned that music is a business as well as a profession and that all music service must be paid for in proportion to its importance.

* * * * * * * *

But, thought has been aroused along all these lines. Many musicians have adopted the slogan, "Nothing for Nothing," and all of them are more awake to necessities and opportunities.

* * * * * * * *

Music News stands pledged to Democratization, Americanization and the proper Commercialization of music in this country, and will leave no stone unturned to further these ends.

* * * * * * * *

Again we say, Co-operation, and constant study of opportunities and the best methods to secure improvements should be the thought of all American musicians.

* * * * * * * *

And with this thought secured there is no need to fear any of the passing political or social unrest, for it will all come out right in the end and the musician, if he but look alertly enough to his own interests, will share in the general prosperity to come.

And so, we may end this Mid-Summer editorial with a correction of the quotation, improperly given above, for we believe implicity that

"There's a Divinity That Shapes Our Ends, Roughhew Them How We Will"

(Shakespeare)

PASSING COMMENT

The death of Oscar Hammerstein, which occurred in New York last week, removes one of the most interesting figures from the music world and changes completely the operatic situation in New York.

It was said, when Mr. Hammerstein first entered the field of grand opera production in the eastern metropolis, that he could not possibly make any headway against the competition of the Metropolitan Opera House.

That he did so most emphatically is musical history.

He not only assembled a wonderful company and produced an endless list of new operas, but he also won the approval of the public and registered unequivocal success.

He brought out all the new French operas and he found singers to present them.

"Thais," "Louise," "The Juggler of Notre Dame," and many other operas which have since become standard in the United States, might not have been produced here to this day except for the energy of Oscar Hammerstein, for the Metropolitan has never shown any alarming activity along the line of production of French operas—new or old.

And we must not forget that Chicago has been a direct beneficiary of the Hammerstein enterprise, for when he sold out his interest, scenery and contracts with singers to the Metropolitan, these were bought up by the Chicago Opera Company, and to this day, in our Auditorium, we are using the scenery and costumes made for Mr. Hammerstein in our "Samson and Delilah," "Thais," "Louise," and several other productions. And, not to mention the many singers who came here to fulfill their contracts with Mr. Hammerstein, we might never have discovered Mary Garden at all, if it had not happened that the Chicago Company bought with the Hammerstein operatic assets a contract with that singer which had several years to run at the time of the closing of the enterprise in New York, and these several years were fulfilled in Chicago, with the result that Miss Garden became, and has remained, our special property, although she has at intervals sung in Paris and New York also.

Oscar Hammerstein was a brilliant figure in the musical field—a fearless man and one of fine instinct for the best in art and in his judgment of what would best appeal to the public.

And, as he was actively planning, at the time of his death, a resumption of his New York operatic activities, it can be repeated, with no fear of contradiction, that had not his death intervened just at this time, the operatic situation in New York, and in the country at large, too, would have been materially altered during the next year.

All musical eyes are looking Lockportward.

The printing of the complete program of the September National American Musical Festival program in last week's Music News has created a sensation, and many who had not previously sensed the great importance of this event have come to a realization that it is indeed a stupendous and a signally indicative thing.

. . . . . .

This week the N. A. O. meets at Pittsburgh, with a program which certainly presages fine results.

Music News will print, next week, a detailed report of this, and, as a matter of course, the Lockport Festival (which will be held from September 1 to 8) will receive our undivided attention.

On Monday morning two little girls were on their way to school, and fearing they would be late, the youngest said to the oldest, "Let's kneel down and pray that we won't be late." The oldest said to the youngest, "Keep on hiking and pray as we hike."

CHURCH OF THE EPIPHANY, CHICAGO

At the 10:45 a. m. service last Sunday the Rev. Father Selzer read to the congregation the following resolution of appreciation and congratulation to Dr. Francis Hemington, the organist and choirmaster, on his twenty-first anniversary at Epiphany Church:

1898-1919. Resolutions of Appreciation and Congratulations to Dr. Francis Hemington, Organist and Choirmaster, on His Twenty-First Anniversary at the Church of the Epiphany, Chicago.

Whereas, Dr. Francis Hemington has on this day completed twenty-one years of service at the Church of the Epiphany, during which time he has been most devoted and efficient in the building up of the choir and the devotional music of the services, thus adding inspiration and true worship and the uplifting of all who use the privilege of attending the services of the church. His high Christian character is reflected in the personnel of the choir, whose loyalty to their leader and the church makes them self-sacrificing in their attendance at rehearsals and services, thus maintaining the high standard of efficiency that our music has attained. The Wardens and Vestrymen, wishing to show their high appreciation and gratitude for his long and faithful service, take this opportunity to express to him their confidence, love and esteem; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we extend to Dr. Francis Hemington our congratulations and sincere thanks for the great work he has accomplished to the "Glory of God and the good of men," and hope that for many years to come the congregation of the Church of the Epiphany and ourselves may enjoy the privilege and blessing of his services, and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be given to Dr. Hemington, and that it be spread on the parish records.

By the Vestry:

George P. Blair, Senior Warden,
E. C. Ward, Junior Warden,
Darius B. Salisbury,
V. G. Gurinian,
John C. Leppert,
George Booth,
A. J. Greenfield,
Herbert Towlson,
Vestrymen.

Chicago, August 3, 1919.

Dr. Hemington was the recipient of many gifts from the choir and members of the congregation, and hearty congratulations were extended to him by everybody.

ALTSCHULER ORCHESTRATING TSCHAIKOWSKY TRIO

Modest Altschuler, conductor of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, after a short stay at Delaware Water Gap, is now settled at Asbury Park, N. J., for the balance of the summer. He is now busily engaged in mapping out the programs for the orchestra for the coming season and, as usual, has discovered a number of interesting Russian novelties. He is also orchestrating the famous Tschaikowsky trio. The suggestion that he do this came from Rachmaninoff, who says that he knows that the composer felt that in limiting himself in this instance to piano, violin and cello, he had made a mistake, for there were possibilities in the composition which only a full orchestra could bring out. As Mr. Altschuler has in the past proved himself an adept in making orchestral arrangements, it goes without saying that the trio in its new form will be an important addition to the Russian Symphony repertoire.

GEORGIA HARPSTER WEATHERS.

A new singer in the Chicago concert field who is to be available for church and concert work this fall is Georgia Harpster Weathers, a new arrival from Omaha, where she has had unprecedented success in oratorio, church, concert and Lyceum and Chautauqua work. For some time she was soprano soloist in the largest English-speaking Lutheran church situated in Omaha, and for a number of years she has directed her own choir of twenty-five voices. She is a singer who possesses, in addition to a splendid voice, fine musicianship, and she will undoubtedly fill a valuable place in Chicago's musical circles. M. C. W.

DEATH OF OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN

By JOSEPH DE VALDOR

Only three months ago the great Oscar told me: "My hat will again fly in the operatic world!" But death has called Hammerstein. Surrounded by his children and wife, he expired at the Lenox Hill Hospital on Friday evening, August 1.

Much can be written of the picturesque impresario who, from a cigarmaker, climbed to the heights of a sensational producer. No operatic manager has promoted the French operas to such an extent as the valiant Oscar. No manager has reckoned the value of French artists for their own repertoire as did this grand old man. His roster of artists, numbering legions, his superb interpreters, challenged the Metropolitan Opera House. Oscar Hammerstein sold out to his competitors, but this did not disturb him. It was only a ten years' injunction, compelling his terrific operatic ambition to stop, and depriving us of a real fighter.

He died, but the man who has stirred two continents will not be forgotten. Money comes and goes, but there will be no two Oscar Hammersteins. He cannot be replaced. He may have imitators, but a second of his kind will never appear on the horizon. We all lose in him a figure which future generations will cherish in memory. He died at an age of seventy-two years, and the entire musical world regrets an irreparable loss.

Music in Chicago

CHICAGO OPERA ASSOCIATION

In line with its policy to make the coming season of opera the most eventful in its history the Chicago Opera Association has arranged with Mr. Norman Bel-Geddes to provide the scenery and costumes for "La Nave," the new opera by Italo Montemezzi, the composer of "L'Amore Dei Tre Re." The libretto is by Gabriel D'Annunzio, based upon his tragic poem of the same name.

Montemezzi is anxious to come to America in search of a subject for his future work. "I hope to find a librettist and a story, and I promise to put my best into the music," he says. "It is impossible to compose an opera on an American theme without staying in the United States, for, with the best intentions, one risks missing the necessary atmosphere, and, besides, I refuse to concede that jazz is the national music of America."

Gabriel D'Annunzio, the greatest Italian poet, has come to be known as the "stormy petrel of Italian politics." After a series of daring exploits while he served as an aviator with the Italian army, he has recently returned to private life and has since been busy acting as the mouthpiece of those who demand a "Greater Italy." His poem, "La Nave," which some declare is his masterpiece, has furnished the libretto of Montemezzi's opera of the same name, which will open the opera company's season. Almost every Italian composer of note has sought to utilize D'Annunzio's poems as librettos for their works, especially the younger school of composers, such as Zandonai and Montemezzi, but the only one who has succeeded, in the opinion of Italian critics, in transferring into music D'Annunzio's poetic thoughts is Montemezzi.

"Am I writing poetry at present?" D'Annunzio is reported to have stated in a recent interview. "This is hardly the time for poetic dreamers. My country needs men of action, and my greatest pride lies in the fact that I am able to serve my native land. Come to America? I really have no time, since Italy needs my services every minute, and, besides, much as America interests me, I see no reason for going there, and I am a bit too old to be attracted by hero-worship."

HENIOT LEVY GOES TO DENVER

Heniot Levy of the American Conservatory will spend the month of August in Colorado, teaching one day out of each week at Denver and vacationing the rest of the time at Estes Park and elsewhere.

Word has just been received that the remarkable Passacaglia for violin and piano, written by Mr. Levy and played here once or twice in MS., is being published by Carl Fischer of New York.

De Vore—Jessie De Vore, Chicago violinist, who has been playing for the Y. M. C. A. abroad, writes Music News that she will return in August. She is enthusiastic over the success of the concerts, which have been 87 in number and have reached 50,000 soldiers in France and Belgium.

PERSHING-RUSSELL

Music News offers congratulations and good wishes to David R. Pershing and Estelle E. Russell, who were married in Chicago on July 11.

Estelle Russell has long been one of the dependable and thoroughly successful Chicago vocal teachers, with studios in the Lyon & Healy Building.

Mr. Pershing is a young baritone with remarkable voice and a personality which will carry him far as a singer.

He has just returned from service in France.

Moody Bible Institute—In connection with the graduating exercises at the Moody Bible Institute two important concerts were given this week, one on Wednesday morning and the other on Thursday afternoon. As usual in the concerts of this school, the programs were made up largely of sacred numbers and there was a deft and artistic admixture of classic and popular pieces, all presented in excellent style and with good effect.

MARRIAGE OF LOUISE BURTON

Louise Burton, Chicago soprano, who has a legion of friends in this city, and who is known professionally throughout the country, was married on July 30 at the home of her parents in California to Benjamin Cooper Boer of Cleveland.

Mr. Boer is an attorney of the Ohio city, and after the first of September Mr. and Mrs. Boer will be at home at 15110 Clifton Boulevard, Lakewood, Ohio.

Mrs. Burton-Boer will no longer be active in the teaching field, which she has signally honored in Chicago, but will, in a limited degree, continue her public singing.

Music News offers congratulations and the best of wishes for prosperity and happiness.

LEVITZKI TO PLAY THE DOHNANYI CONCERTO

Mischa Levitzki, who is summering at Avon-by-the-Sea, N. J., despite his devotion to swimming, golfing and motoring, is finding time to make some highly interesting additions to his repertoire for next season. The most important among them will be the Dohnanyi Concerto for piano and orchestra, which is practically unknown here, since it has been rarely given since it was played by the composer himself several years ago. It is a work of unusual values, and since Levitzki began his preliminary study of it when working with Dohnanyi in Berlin in antebellum days, his interpretation will be awaited with uncommon interest. It is likely that he will play it for the first time when he appears as soloist with the Minneapolis Orchestra in Minneapolis and St. Paul on November 6 and 7.

AUGUSTA COTTLOW TO VACATION IN VERMONT

Augusta Cottlow and her husband, Edgar A. Gerst, and her mother, will take a few weeks of rest at Pittsford, Vt. Miss Cottlow has had an arduous summer preparing programs for next season and teaching a number of interesting pupils. Miss Cottlow's services as teacher have been in demand, especially by teachers from the South, who have come to her for coaching on repertoire and ideas in teaching.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE

The last concert of the season last Saturday morning at the Chicago Musical College was given by pupils of the guest teachers and proved a most delightful hour. Mrs. Cornella D. Lampton-Forrest, a pupil of Percy Grainger, played two Grainger compositions with exquisite delicacy of touch and tonal color.

Verna Lean, a Wisconsinite, who is working with Witherspoon, sang Meyerbeer's "Ah mon fils" in a charming way. Miss Lean possesses not only a voice but personality and marked interpretative ability as well.

Abraham Sopkin, an Auer hopeful, played the Saint-Saens B Minor Concerto with good tone and ample technique. Another Auer pupil, Max Glickstene, just a boy, played the Bruch G minor with astounding verve and facility. Silver Lent was still another astonishing youngster of Auer product whose group was permeated with great ease and temperamental abandon.

Both of Mr. Saenger's pupils sang with brilliancy and tone which was well placed and pointed. They were Ruth Bechert Wunchel of Des Moines, Iowa, whose mezzo voice was not lacking in mellowness, and Mrs. Bowen of Arkansas, whose voice was high and brilliant in timbre.

Lucille Martindale of Columbus, Ohio, of the Witherspoon class did no small credit to Mr. Witherspoon in two well-chosen songs.

The program was brought to a brilliant and altogether satisfying conclusion by Miss Edith Friedman, who, with Mr. Grainger at the second piano, played the Grieg A minor Concerto with great expression and the acumen of a finished artist.

VITTORIO TREVISAN MUCH IN DEMAND

Vittorio Trevisan of the Chicago Opera Company, who has recently returned from appearances in the City of Mexico and who will be in his Kimball Hall studio throughout the Summer, is a teacher of voice and an operatic coach with few equals in the country.

VITTORIO TREVISAN

It was he who discovered the fine voice of Mario Rubini (pictured in Music News last week) and taught him so well that he immediately attracted the attention of the singers of the Chicago Opera Company last Winter.

Dolci took young Rubini with him on tour and gave him daily lessons, and Rosa Raisa was interested to the extent that she has made the young "Lyrico Aspintto (not "Lyrico-Sprito," as printed in Music News last week) her protege and expects to see him safely placed in grand opera.

Both Dolci and Raisa chose Trevisan as the permanent teacher of the young tenor, and he is now under the instruction of that fine operatic master.

Mr. Trevisan is not only inimitable in his own parts, but he has also an unlimited knowledge of the voice and the repertoire necessary in opera, and at his studio there may be found many operatic singers who come to him for instruction in the art and who find in him an invaluable master.

MARIA WINETZKAJA RE-ENGAGED WITH BRACCALE

Following her recent successes with the Braccale Opera Company, at Havana, the brilliant mezzo-soprano has been re-engaged for the third time to appear under the same management. Some time in September she will sing at Caracas, and later in the season through the Latin-American countries. She wishes to make the announcement that her interests will be no longer taken care of by the Music League of America, and that her bookings will be effected by her personal representative, Mr. A. Winetzky, 1772 Weeks avenue, New York.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

Two students of the graduating class of Northwestern University School of Music gave a most gratifying short program on Monday, July 28. They were Miss Edna Jakes, contralto, a pupil of Mr. Grant-Schaefer, and Miss Marjorie Gallagher, pupil of Gail Martin Haake.

The program was as follows:

I Opened All the Portals Wide (Kate Chopin)
The Sea (Wm. Wordsworth)
The Wind Speaks
.....Grant-Schaefer
Sonata, F minor .....Scarlatti
Courante, F minor .....Scarlatti
For the Sake o' Somebody (Robert Burns)..... Grant-Schaefer

Andante Lagrimoso.....Liszt
A la bien Aimee, Valse.....Schuett
Molly (Young) .....Victor Herbert
Ma' Little Sunflower, Good Night (Louis Weslyn) ..... Vanderpool
Magical June (Wallace) .....Hilton-Turvey

The recital proved doubly interesting because of the attractive, unassuming manner of both girls, but especially of Miss Gallagher, who combined a modesty almost amounting to timidity with technical preparation and musical feeling worthy of the highest commendation. And not only did Miss Gallagher carry away honors for her solo work, but for her tasteful and artistic accompaniments for Miss Jakes.

Six Grant-Schaefer songs sung by Miss Jakes offered an interesting diversity of subject and treatment.

JEANNETTE DURNO STUDIOS

Jeannette Durno is presenting a series of recitals in the Durno studios on Friday mornings at 11 o'clock for the class of pianists and teachers who are working with her throughout August.

A feature of the recital on August 15 will be the Brahms violin sonata in G major, in which Miss Durno will have the able assistance of Reber Johnson, a gifted young violinist, who plays first violin with the Damrosch Orchestra.

Jones—Ethel Jones, mezzo, is spending the summer at The Devil's Backbone, near Lamont, Iowa, as hostess to a camping party.

BESSIE ANDRUS

At the Hippodrome a week or so ago, the soloist was in the charming person of Bessie Andrus, whose possession is not limited to a magnetic personality only, but a lovely coloratura voice as well. She sang the Doll Aria from "Tales of Hoffman" exceptionally well and with atmosphere accruing to the title, with the insight only expected of an experienced and thorough artist.

Miss Andrus has been very successful in her interpretations of old-fashioned songs, and costume songs in general, and has received much commendation in this particular work. She has great clarity of tone, and her voice showed up in all its lightness and refinement in the songs which followed, including "Wait Till the Clouds Roll By," "Serenade" (Paladilhe) and a new song by Mme. Sturkow-Ryder, "Old-Fashioned Flowers." In this song she put all the sentiment and the exquisite delicacy and refinement for which her work is noted.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE NOTES

Re-engagement of Guest Teachers

Of the guest teachers whose work has aroused so much enthusiasm among the students at the Chicago Musical College, Percy Grainger, Oscar Saenger and Herbert Witherspoon have already entered into arrangements with the institution to return next Summer. Professor Auer and Clarence Eddy will not finish their period of instruction until next week. Their colleagues, previously mentioned, left Chicago last Sunday.

Rudolph Reuter has been engaged to play with the Stadium Orchestra in New York this week. ♮ ♮ ♮

The Summer session of the Chicago Musical College has been the most successful which the institution ever has given to the public. Students so crowded the lesson periods and the classes of the guest teachers that it was impossible to allot any time to those who, having failed to register early enough, wished to avail themselves of the teaching of the distinguished instructors who had come to Chicago from New York. Nor were the permanent members of the faculty less busy.

Walton Pyre, one of the most notable teachers of dramatic art in America, has been added to the faculty of the Chicago Musical College. Mr. Pyre will take charge of the School of Acting in the institution when it opens for the Fall term September 15. Frederik Frederiksen, violinist, is another acquisition that has been made by the college. Mr. Frederiksen, a pupil of Sauret, also will join the faculty next September.

CLARENCE EDDY IN ORGAN RECITAL

Chicago proved two things conclusively on last Friday evening:

(1) That it can get along very well indeed without any street car or elevated trains, when put to the test; and

(2) That the drawing power of Clarence Eddy as an organ recitalist is far, far from being on the wane, and on the contrary was the cause of a remarkable demonstration at that time.

There was not a street car or an elevated train in the city in operation and, as you know, the Hyde Park Baptist Church is a good long walk from the Illinois Central Railroad (its nearest point of transportation) and, besides, it is far out on the South Side.

But, in spite of these facts, the large church was filled to the last place, every available extra seat was put in and even the pulpit was crowded with those who had paid their money to hear Mr. Eddy play in one of the series of University Summer Night Concerts, usually held at Mandel Hall, but on this occasion transferred to the church, because of its larger seating capacity and also the fact that the organ there is a really superior instrument.

There were no fewer than fifteen hundred people in the audience at this time—perhaps a good many more than that.

Mr. Eddy has long been regarded as the dean of Organists in America. The quality of his art has been proven to be of the best for many years, and his personality and general intelligence are such that he has been enabled to make a great fame for himself and to hold it securely.

There is a certain suavity in the playing of Mr. Eddy which pertains to the work of but few other organists.

He is such a past master of technic, so adept in registrations and so absolutely resourceful in all the possibilities of the organ that he never loses the smooth flow of whatever composition he may be playing, and his shading, coloring and climax building are always logical and convincing.

And he is a master builder of programs. On Friday he gave some of the Old Classics, some of the modern French master works, a good deal of American composition—"something new and something old" (an infallible recipe for holding attention), and, to cap the climax of expectation on the part of those not too highly versed in profundity as it applies to music, he played a most charmingly simple and ravishingly beautiful arrangement of the well-known "Ave Maria," by Schubert.

And this was a piece of wisdom which all recitalists might always copy, with good effect.

For nothing is more sure than that there are, in almost every audience, scores who will appreciate this kind of music, and will adore the player, when they might go away untouched by a program which was altogether technical and introspective.

The Prelude and Fugue on B-A-C-H (Bach) was clearly played, and the French school admirably depicted in a "Romance Without Words" and a "Caprice Heroique" of Bonnet.

"Hope," a new work of Yon, proved fascinating, as also a wonderfully played Caprice of Westerholm.

One is tempted to say that the "Evening Harmonies" (Karg-Elert) was the gem of the program, for it proved engrossingly beautiful and clever beyond telling in the manipulation accorded by Mr. Eddy.

Stoughton's new "Neptune" is a big piece and seems, at first, a little too diffuse. It contains a wealth of fine material, however, and familiarity may make it standard. At all events, it is a good piece of American writing and another step along that desirable way.

The Scherzo of Enrico Bossi, beloved of concert organists, was played so well by Mr. Eddy as to provide an object lesson to most of them, and the program ended with a brilliant setting forth of the "Festal March," by Oscar E. Schminke.

Just before this was a thoroughly interesting number, consisting of the bracketed "Morning Song" of Alfred Hollins and the "Night Song" of Herbert J. Wrightson, the former being a well-known English composer and the latter a teacher in Chicago.

Both pieces proved grateful material for an organ concert, and together provided contrast as well as beauty.

The Wrightson piece was best and disclosed a remarkable flow of progression of effective harmonies, as well as of good melody, and rose at the climax to a point of dramatic color.

There was unlimited applause and the injection of several encores into the program, which was played without pause.

At least one of these encores was of exceptional interest, and I will find out more about it and tell you the details later.

MRS. A. M. VIRGIL

A figure which has grown to stand at the very heights of importance in the piano-pedagogic world of New York is Mrs. A. M. Virgil, whose intelligence and fine art combined have served to make her a teacher without a superior.

And this importance has long since traveled far out of New York itself, where she maintains her piano school.

A remarkable personality is Mrs. Virgil—alert, resourceful and thoroughly en rapport with the best of educational principles and the latest word in piano technics.

For years she has studied the scientific as well as the artistic qualities of piano playing, and as a result has evolved a method which, when intelligently employed, never fails to produce remarkable results.

Her young pupils have often been heard in recitals of piano music when not only was the question of speed and accuracy eloquently answered, but when, also—piano playing with a story and a message underneath it was shown in all possible attractiveness.

Mrs. Virgil, besides being a teacher of piano, and especially along the lines of her own technical evolution—is also a composer and an inventor.

She has written many of the exercises, books and pieces which are used to develop her remarkable technic, and she is the inventor also of a practice keyboard, which is a marvel of ingenuity and skill.

Added to all these technical, scientific and artistic qualities, Mrs. Virgil is a woman of the broadest intelligence and has an unfailing interest in everything pertaining to life.

Her pupils swear by her and it is largely because she is so fine in her own personality that the success of her great technical discoveries has been so great.

ARTHUR KRAFT

Arthur Kraft, tenor, writes from the Wellington Hotel, New York, which is his residence at present, that in a recent appearance at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. Silverthorne in Sharon, Conn., he repeated with much success the manuscript songs of Arthur Nevin, which made so fine an impression when they were sung at the recent N. F. M. C. meeting at Peterborough, N. H.

On the same program Mr. Kraft used songs of Frank Waller and one of Louis Koemmenich called "A Sprig of Rosemary."

Mr. Kraft will continue his work with Frank La Forge in New York until the latter part of September, when he will return to Chicago.

His booking of concert engagements for the coming season is a very heavy one.

Woodside Park—At Woodside Park, week of July 26 to August 1, Miss Gertrude MacDonnell was the soprano soloist, and among other songs used were "The Magic of Your Eyes," "Smilin' Through," "Today, Tomorrow, and Forever," "Sorter Miss You," "Dear Little Boy of Mine," "Starlight Love" and "Kiss Me Again." She is quite a favorite at the Park, where she has often sung with Rodia's Band in the past.

Madame Butterfly

On Tuesday evening (and again on Saturday) a gorgeous production of "Madame Butterfly" was made, both evenings witnessing splendid audiences, that of Saturday being a sell-out.

No opera has been so well presented at

FLORENCE EASTON

Ravinia and it was given practically in entirety, the cuts being so small as to almost escape notice.

The stage manager deserves unlimited credit for the skill he displayed in placing this opera on the Ravinia boards, and, in the opinion of many, not even the Auditorium productions of the Puccini work are more beautifully or appropriately costumed, staged and acted.

There was a surprising depth to the scene, a wonderfully beautiful out-of-door aspect to the garden of the Butterfly house, real field and garden flowers to embellish the second act, a sparkling display of fireflies in the garden scene—in short, an attention to detail which was convincing and realistic.

And certainly no Auditorium production has ever had so satisfactory a cast as had that at Ravinia.

Music News has commented again and again on the splendid team work of Florence Easton and Morgan Kingston, and in "Butterfly" there must be added to this the very unusual charm of the Suzuki as presented by Alice Gentle and the excellence of Thomas Chalmers, constituting the best quartet of singers ever seen in the opera.

Such opulence and beauty of tonal work has seldom been put into the Suzuki part as at this time—far and away surpassing the previous singer of the role at Ravinia.

And not only is Miss Gentle's voice of superlative worth and beauty, but also her histrionism is so far above the average as to be entirely remarkable.

This Suzuki was entirely original in costume and in pose, and she evinced a human interest in the play which was at times uncanny, and especially so when compared to the majority of Suzukis who go through the stereotyped and conventional part as first set forth by someone who had more voice than brains.

This Suzuki is alert to every scene; she listens from the doorway or from behind the screen to every sentence uttered on the stage; her mobile face registers constant understanding of the development of the plot, and at climactic moments she is equal in intensity to Miss Easton herself.

And this, I take it, is praise supreme, for Miss Easton is so superintelligent as well as so beautiful vocally as to have established herself without a peer among Ravinia sopranos.

In "Butterfly" she is particularly adept and her dramatic conception of the role ranges all the way from the timid unsophistication of the young girl of the first act to the tragic figure in the final scene, covering every aspect of the case fully and in a thoroughly satisfying way.

The Flower Duet with Miss Gentle was a superb bit of work, and this same charm and power were put into all the ensembles with Mr. Kingston, who as Pinkerton lived up to the very best traditions of his own art and far surpassed most of the long procession of Pinkertons who have moved across our stage.

Mr. Kingston's figure suits the part admirably; his personality is particularly apt to it, and his voice, as in every part he has sung this year, was glorious.

A splendid musician is Mr. Kingston, and not only did he present all solo work assigned to Pinkerton with splendid security but also, as said just now, proved himself absolutely en rapport with the fine art of Miss Easton in the abounding duets for Butterfly and Pinkerton, and, further, he was magnificent in the several forceful duet numbers with Sharpless.

This part was played so nearly faultlessly

RICHARD HAGEMAN AT BREAKFAST

by Thomas Chalmers as to make it a figure long to be remembered.

A peculiarly handsome figure it was, and as beautifully vocal.

Louis D'Angelo sang both Yamadori and The Bonze and did them both remarkably well, his voice covering every requirement of the vocal scores absolutely, and his histrionic ability being exceptionally well displayed, especially as The Bonze.

Daddi was sufficiently oleaginous as Goro;

MORGAN KINGSTON

Philine Falco an attractive Kate Pinkerton, and Mr. Toft, The Commissioner.

Gennaro Papi was in command of the performance and not only evoked some remarkable ensemble beauties from the chorus but also held the orchestra to a virility rarely attained and a fine art which reflected great credit on the organization as well as upon himself.

C. E. W.

Carmen

Sunday evening brought the first performance of "Carmen" at Ravinia, with Alice Gentle in the title role, Riccardo Martin as Don Jose, and with Leon Rothier, Millo Picco, Louis D'Angelo and others in the cast. Mr. Hageman conducted the work with great artistry and style.

Miss Gentle has the voice for Carmen and she displayed histrionic gifts in her presentation, although the Ravinia version of the opera is not in favor of the name part.

Mr. Martin sang his aria well, but one can only wish he might be heard in a role more to his liking. Rothier was a tower of artistic strength, and Picco did his best to make a success of his role.

Miss Mason was lovely in the aria.

Other Operas

On Wednesday evening the fine "La Boheme" of Ravinia was repeated, and on Thursday evening Edith Mason appeared in "Faust."

On Sunday, August 3, "Carmen" had its first performance of the season, Alice Gentle appearing in the name part.

On Tuesday there was a repetition of "Tosca," and on Wednesday of "Cavalleria."

Tomorrow (Saturday) evening will see a repetition of "Carmen."

Concerts

Following the usual schedule, there were matinee concerts on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, with the usual children's program on Thursday afternoon.

The concert this (Friday) evening will be of semi-classical character, and that of tomorrow (Saturday) afternoon is made up largely of comic opera selections.

AT THE MACBURNEY STUDIOS

It was very warm last Monday evening all over the loop, but the Barnum Recital Hall in the Fine Arts Building, where Mr. MacBurney presented Fred Hall Huntley in song recital, was a little cooler than most other places, and both Mr. Huntley and his splendid accompanist, Harrold B. Simonds, who were dressed in white flannels, seemed calmly cool and able to make an excellent showing with the attractive program prepared.

Mr. Huntley has a big voice and a rather serious style, and therefore he was on Monday, as always, best in his classic group.

This comprised "Oh, Ruddier Than the Cherry" (Handel), "False Phillis" (old English), "As on the Swelling Wave" (Caldara), "Where'er You Walk" (Handel) and "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly" (Purcell)—a fine list, splendidly presented.

Mr. Huntley, however, has a neat sense of humor also, and his "Crabbed Age and Youth" (Loomis), "The Ladies of St. James" (Clarke) and "I've Got a Sixpence" (Whitney) were presented with style and unction as well, while "Light" (Sinding) and "Roadways" (Densmore), big songs both, gave full sweep to the dramatic power which, as a third asset, Mr. Huntley is easily able to bring forth on requirement.

"Come Away, Death," a peculiar song of Barratt, was well liked as done by this intelligent and artistic singer, and the program contained, further, the Deems Taylor Song Cycle, "The City of Joy."

The music of this work is interesting and at times beautiful, but the text seems labored and not in the least suitable for musical setting.

Mr. Huntley did a great deal with the number, but left me unconvinced as to its value.

Mr. Simonds throughout again proved his alert musicianship and fine intelligence, and the audience, a very good one for so hot a night, found the entire program very much to its liking.

CHICAGO OPERA ASSOCIATION

The simultaneous engagement of Titta Ruffo and Carlo Galeffi as members of the Chicago Opera Association will bring together the two principal aspirants and rivals for the honor of being called "The world's greatest baritone." The two singers have many partisans, and their respective claims are equally vociferous, but it will be the first time that the two will appear upon the same stage, and the first time a direct comparison will be possible.

It is needless to inform the Chicago public of the merits of Titta Ruffo. He has recently enjoyed a great triumph in Mexico, and his voice is said to be as marvelous as ever. Galeffi is a native of Parma, the home city of Mr. Campanini. Within the past five years he has been as popular as any baritone in Europe. In Italy he is looked upon as one of the greatest singers and actors the lyric stage has produced. The great hold he has upon his Italian admirers is quite equaled by his popularity in Spain and South America.

sense of pure art, of the present day, and despite our patriotic indorsement of American music, it must be said that the class in which these Russian composers belong is seldom entered by our native productions, of which there is at least an enormous quantity. The boldest reviewer must shrink before the tidal wave of new publications which overwhelms him each month. There is of course much that is good, perhaps better than ever before. The Art Publication Society of St. Louis is putting out a number of worthy and eminently practical compositions, with pedagogical editing of a high order. Portrait and biographical notes of each composer are found on each piece, making the personal element a decided one, and the printing is of the best.

The Gilbert Music Company issues a rather remarkable composition by Walter Keller of Chicago. It is a Prelude and Fugue, for piano, the remarkable feature consisting in their being playable simultaneously by two pianos, or piano and organ. When it is added that this is by no means all, but that eight-part counterpoint is kept up from beginning to end, it will be realized that the labor involved in such an ingenious composition must have been great. And it really sounds very well, all together—in fact best of all in that manner of performance. The fugue has some departures from academical prescription, which, however, may well be pardoned by the critic when he makes the startling discovery that the Prelude and Fugue which he had looked through seriatim are to be rendered "en masse," so to speak.

It is always a question whether, in a work of this kind, there is not more lost than is gained, from a musical standpoint, on account of the mechanical difficulties involved. There is only about one composer the writer can recall in whose work artistic effect was always paramount, regardless of immense complexities, and his name was Bach. This much may be said of Mr. Keller's work, however: there are very many noted musicians who could not have done it at all.

Six of the negro melodies which have had some publicity in recent years, such as "Deep River" and "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child," are arranged with characteristic skill by the noted African-English composer.

The field bugle exercises are by the teacher of Trumpeting and Bugling at the New England Conservatory and are in a little booklet of vest pocket size.

Happy Thoughts by Ella Harrison. Price 75c. (Clayton F. Summy Company.) A set of useful little pieces for little pupils.

Second Violin Concerts, Op. 43, by Cecil Burleigh. Price $2 net. (Carl Fischer.)

This work is one of those that contribute to the prestige of American music. It is a classic composition, constructed after the best models with ample technical resources in evidence. Harmonically it is rich and varied without being ultra modern. Although the idioms of Indian music are said to form the groundwork of the composition, the first movement is slightly suggestive of Grieg. The second movement is a very short "chant," "in pensive mood" and with muted violin, while the third is very brilliant and distinctly Indian in tone. Let us repeat, American music owes Mr. Burleigh a vote of thanks.

Wilson—The seven weeks' summer course which Raymond Wilson, the American pianist, offered at Syracuse, N. Y., for piano students this year has just ended. A large number of students from distant points, as well as many local teachers, and others, sought enrollment on Mr. Wilson's schedule, which proved to be a very heavy one. So great was the success of the course this summer that the pianist is being strongly urged to give a similar course next season. Mr. Wilson is now at his summer home at Oxford, Pa., where he will be until the middle of September preparing his programs for next season. His recitals will start early in October, with several dates in the East, to be followed by a tour of the Middle West, including a recital in Chicago on October 29.

SUMMER NOTES FROM MILWAUKEE

The final recitals and commencements of the various studios and schools were ended by the time the National Education Association opened its convention in the first week of July, and many of the local teachers attended the conferences pertaining to music. Many, however, took the week's respite for a rest in the country before the opening of Summer school terms.

Schools

The Marquette University School of Music is holding a six weeks' term in all branches.

The State Normal School music department is also having a six weeks' term.

Teachers of the Wisconsin Conservatory of Music are carrying on lessons with individual pupils, but no regular Summer course will be held.

Personals

Frank Olin Thompson, head of the piano department of the Wisconsin Conservatory of Music, spent the Fourth of July vacation at Bonnie Oaks, Briggsville, returning for work the month of July. On August 1 he left for a month at Bonnie Oaks.

Miss Katherine Clarke, head of the vocal department of the Wisconsin Conservatory of Music, with her pupils, Verna Lean (also member of the faculty) and Agnes Havenor Timme, is taking the special Summer course with Herbert Witherspoon at the Chicago Musical College. Miss Lean's splendid contralto voice and Mrs. Timme's lovely soprano voice have been commented upon most favorably by Mr. Witherspoon.

Georgia Hall Quick, the local pianist, and Otto Miessner are both convalescing from recent operations.

Lucille Wilkin, artist pupil of Jacob Moerschel, is spending part of the Summer in California.

Milton H. Rusch, Hugo Aubalt and Lewis Vantine of the Normal School faculty are all teaching in the Summer session, at the close of which Mr. Rusch and Mr. Aubalt will leave on a canoe trip in northern Wisconsin.

Iva Bigelow Weaver closed her season with a very interesting recital by a number of her pupils and will spend most of the Summer in the East.

The W. J. L. Meyer School of Music is continuing regularly through the Summer, and the scope of the school will be widened considerably next Fall.

Jacob Moerschel discontinued his teaching July 1 for two months and will take an absolute rest from all teaching until the Fall term opens at Normal, at which time he will also resume his private instruction.

Clementine Malek, soprano, and Elsa Bloedel, contralto, two of the most popular local artists, are eliminating some of their teaching during the hot weather, but as they are always two of the busiest singers in the city they are not taking a complete vacation. As members of the artist quartet to which their splendid musicianship adds much they have become widely known and justly popular with the park-going public, and their solo work is always of especial interest. A duet combination for concert work by Miss Malek and Miss Bloedel would soon gain more than local renown for them.

Alex. MacFadyen is spending the summer at home in Milwaukee and working on some new compositions.

Churches

The solo positions in the Christian Science churches are being filled regularly. Elsa Bloedel and Beecher Burton are singing in their respective positions. Verna Lean occupies the unique position of sole soloist at Emmanuel Presbyterian Church, and her attendance there has been prolonged and unusually regular.

St. Paul's Episcopal Church Choir sang its last big service on June 22, and W. H. Williamson, organist and director, had an unusually heavy program for that Sunday. A goodly number of the choir attended during the hot weather, but Mr. Williamson makes the work as light as possible. The musical part of the service at St. Paul's is always interesting to the lover of good music in church, and Mr. Williamson keeps his choir rehearsed in a large repertoire. A resumption of presentation of oratorios by his choir is contemplated for the coming Winter.

St. John's Cathedral choirboys were given a week's outing at camp, and Otto Singenberger, organist and director, is also giving his soloists considerable rest from regular routine this summer, but is already planning on big things for Winter. The first event will be a concert in November.

Concert Announcements and Rumors

The Marion-Andrews Concert Bureau will open its season October 13 with the Chicago Opera Company. The operas to be presented are "Aida," "Madame Butterfly" and "La Boheme." The concert artists in the series include Galli-Curci, Toscha Seidel, Charles Hackett and Louise Homer. Miss Andrews reports an unprecedented advance seat sale.

Margaret Rice is having such a phenomenal subscription sale for the Chicago Orchestra series of ten concerts that there will probably not be enough seats to satisfy the usual single seat sale, and the orchestra will this season play to sold-out houses.

Joseph C. Grieb, manager of the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, of which Herman Zeitz is director, will shortly announce some interesting plans of the orchestra for this season, and he will also have a number of splendid attractions at the Auditorium this season.

George M. Lipschultz will direct the largely augmented orchestra at the Alhambra September 1 and plans a number of innovations and novelties. His own solo work is always a big feature wherever he plays.

HORACE CLARK

Two notices of recent recitals given by pupils of Horace Clark of Houston, Texas, are herein quoted as taken from the Houston daily papers:

Recital of Marked Charm

The spacious home of Mrs. R. E. Burt was taxed to its capacity Thursday afternoon on the occasion of Helen Neumann's recital. Since her appearance last year this gifted pupil of Horace Clark has developed remarkably. There is an ease and fluency, an artistic perception of music revealed in her playing that few pupils of 14 years have attained. The playing of the entire program was characterized by poise and a restraint with freedom that made it most satisfying to the listener. While each number was well done, the "Mendelssohn Spinning Song" was especially so. As it flowed from her fingers it was an unconscious effluence of music's voice, unhampered by the material medium of expression.

Mrs. Corrie Patteson Clark was heard in a group of songs especially suited to this gifted singer. In the song "Sylvia" (by Speaks) she gave as fine an example of sustained melodic flow as one seldom hears. Her "mezzo voice" floated upon the breath as effortless and unrestricted as the song of a bird. She caught the spirit of joyousness in the "Spring Dawn" (by Horace Clark) and sang it with telling effect.

The hostess, Mrs. Burt, served punch on the veranda after the program and the guests spent a delightful social hour together. The young pianist was showered with flowers and she will remember this event as one of the happiest of her young life.

Recital at Rice

A large and appreciative audience greeted the pupils of Horace Clark last Tuesday on the occasion of their recital at the Rice Hotel. It was interesting throughout, for the playing of each one showed a teaching in which there was a fine appraisement of their individual gifts, a rare judgment in the selection of music commensurate with their understanding and skill so that their playing seemed a natural expression of their individuality rather than something they had learned through imitation.

Space forbids an individual mention, so it must suffice to say that each pupil at her particular stage of progress showed a thoughtful preparation, a musical interpretation, culminating in the artistic performances of Margaret Hertford and Mrs. Henry Johns in the Chopin, Liszt and Schumann selections. This was unusually fine playing, of which any teacher might be justly proud.

Mrs. Corrie Patteson-Clark contributed much to the program by her singing of "Night Time" (Horace Clark) and "Nymphs and Fauns" (Bemberg). These were both beautifully done and the word is used advisedly, for in the latter there was a plasticity of voice, a grace of vocal embellishment which made it distinctly an artistic bit of work.

The program had the great merit of being not too long, so the note of personal interest from the audience was held to the close.

HELENE KANDERS

HELENE KANDERS
A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

The judicious mixture of many qualities lies in the make-up of the great singer, and not the least important of these is personality. She may be a beautiful woman by all the laws of symmetry; she may have a marvelous voice and flawless production, but without personality she will leave her audience cold. In a word, personality is the secret of drawing power, and drawing power is the secret of success!

That Helene Kanders has personality was proved beyond a doubt last season, when, in spite of inclement weather, a large and enthusiastic audience assembled to hear her Carnegie Hall recital, which proved a triumph.

Miss Kanders was born in California of Russo-Belgian parents, and early gave promise of what has developed into a beautiful voice of lyric-dramatic quality and of unusual power and range. "I feel that I owe all my success to my teacher in Vienna," she said when recently interviewed, and success was not slow in coming to this young singer. At the age of eighteen she signed a contract with the Strasbourg Opera Company for three seasons, where she sang the roles of "Butterfly," Mimi in "La Boheme," Nedda in "Pagliacci," "Mignon," Marguerite in "Faust," Tosca in "Tosca," Rosaura in "Le Donne Curiose," Elvira in "Don Giovanni," Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," and many others. Following this she was engaged by the Royal Opera in Brussels and received flattering offers to sing in Dresden and Munich. The outbreak of war found her still in Brussels and well on the road to fame. Rather than remain during German occupation, an unwilling witness of the cruel oppression of a brave little people, partly hers by birth, Helene Kanders left Belgium and came to this country, going first to her native California, but returning east to sign a contract with Mr. Gatti-Casazza for one season with the Metropolitan Opera, with the stipulation that she should sing leading roles.

Her initial recital in Carnegie Hall, which followed towards the close of the season 1918-19, was such an unqualified success as to justify her temporary abandonment of the operatic stage, that she might devote her energies to concert singing, where the possibilities are unlimited for one whose extraordinary quality of voice is equally adaptable to the light as to the dramatic element of the realm of song. Offers from Europe again tempted her, but indecision plays no part in the make-up of this young California girl, whose heart is set on an American career, which is well on the road to maturity. Having booked her already for recitals in Boston, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, Cleveland, Providence, Pittsburgh, Detroit and Chicago, her manager announces her as in the concert field for the season.

It is in Miss Kanders' favor that she is a beautiful woman, perfectly poised, and with a charm of manner that carries all before it.

MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Orchestral Association of Minneapolis announces a change in the management of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra that is indicative of increased activity on the part of that organization.

Edmund A. Stein, who has been for four years the assistant manager of the orchestra, goes to St. Paul, where he will devote his time to the management of the concerts of the orchestra in that city and endeavor to build up the patronage for the orchestral season there to the standard which has been reached in Minneapolis. His acquaintance from residence of long standing in St. Paul should be a big asset to him in this endeavor. In addition to managing the orchestra concerts he, in connection with Richard J. Horgan, will broaden out to considerable extent the activities of the firm of Horgan & Stein in recital management in the Twin Cities and surrounding territory.

Mr. Stein will be succeeded as assistant manager in Minneapolis by Carlo Fischer, who held this position for four years previous to Mr. Stein's incumbency. The past four years Mr. Fischer has been second cellist of the orchestra in addition to writing the program notes and editing the program books, which latter work he will continue.

The present will be Mr. Fischer's fourteenth year that he has been connected with the Minneapolis organization, his first five years having brought him an enviable reputation as solo cellist of the orchestra and made for him a host of friends.

Wendell Heighton, manager of the orchestra, continues in this capacity, having charge of the engaging of the artists, the booking of the tours and the general direction of the business affairs. He is at present in California arranging for the third Midwinter tour of the orchestra to the Pacific Coast.

Emil Oberhoffer, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, is spending his vacation at his beautiful summer home in southern Minnesota, where he divides his time between farming, studying new scores, preparing the programs for the coming season and running his new automobile.

Arrangements for the seventeenth season are well under way, and both Mr. Fischer and Mr. Stein are actively engaged in preparing for the local seasons in Minneapolis and St. Paul. Prospects point to the most brilliant musical Winter in the Twin Cities under the management of these two well-known and capable men whose broad and varied experiences in the past well fit them for the important positions which they occupy.

Stein—Karl Buren Stein presented the following pupils of the Waukegan Branch of the Auditorium Conservatory in recital at the Parish House in that city on August 1: Dorothy Douglas, Merlin Morgen, Elsie Higginbotham, Lottie Krivicka, Frank Ruth, Irene Loehr, Anna Sorrensen, Janet Havens, Lydia Abrahamsen, Ernest La Chapelle, Cornelia Lindemann, Otto Pykonen and Della Gordon.

Phillipson—Mary E. Phillipson, soprano, will spend the week of August 10 in Iowa, where she will be heard professionally.

A GREAT QUARTET OF TENORS

"The greatest quartet of living tenors" is the way the Italian newspapers describe the tenors belonging to the Italian contingent of the Chicago Opera Association—Bonci, Dolci, Di Giovanni and Schipa.

"Is Eduoardo di Giovanni an American or an Italian tenor?" many people ask. According to several Italian critics, the fact that he was born in America does not alter Italy's right to claim him as her own, since they maintain that in art it is the country of one's development, and not the one of one's birth, that determines an artist's nationality. In Italy Johnson is looked upon as the leading dramatic tenor of the day, no American singer ever having attained such an exalted position in the Italian operatic world.

Tito Schipa is today one of Italy's most popular tenors, and has achieved within the brief period of six years one of the most sensational careers known to the lyric stage. He is a native of Lecce, Italy. Soon after his appearances in Italy's leading opera houses he was engaged for the Monte Carlo season, where he proved a veritable sensation. Then followed a series of triumphal engagements in Spain. His return to Italy was hailed as an operatic event.

MUSIC WEEK AT CHAUTAUQUA

A Fine List of Programs by the New York Symphony Orchestra—The August Quartet a Good One—Robert Quait Scores Unusual Success

Reported by MRS. E. D. BEVITT

Chautauqua Music Week was inaugurated with the Sunday evening concert given by the Chautauqua Choir, New York Symphony Orchestra, with Vahrah Hanbury, soprano; Emma Gilbert, contralto; Robert Quait, tenor; Fred Patton, bass, as soloists. Alfred Hallam conducted the ensemble and M. Pollain the orchestral numbers.

A word as to M. Pollain, director of the New York Symphony Orchestra. The regular leader, Walter Damrosch, who is in France, asked the French Government to favor America by sending the best they had to take his place, so we who have had the opportunity of seeing him in charge do not wonder that they sent M. Rene Pollain, and are grateful to the French for the selection. America has known him through his work in his native country, France, but only since October have they known him and his work intimately. He conducts with ease, grace and authority, and leaves nothing to be desired in the results obtained. For the orchestra itself, it is indeed fitting to celebrate this Victory Year with the advent of a superb organization, and that it is appreciated is attested by the rapt attention it receives and the enormous crowds present to hear it. There are in number, counting conductor and business manager, fifty-one men. Special mention may be made of the string section, flutes, oboe and harp.

The program for Monday afternoon follows:

Monday Afternoon, July 28

American Fantasie.....Victor Herbert
Overture to Phedre.....J. Massenet
L'Arlesienne, First Suite.....G. Bizet
Prelude; menuet; adagietto; carillon
Aria—My Heart Is Weary (Nadeshda).....
.....Goring Thomas
Emma Gilbert
Samson and Delilah.....Saint-Saens
Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
Preludes.....Liszt
Conductor, Rene Pollain

The Suite "L'Arlesienne" was most attractive in its entirety. The number from Goring Thomas' "Nadeshda," "My Heart Is Weary," was sung by Miss Emma Gilbert, the contralto for July. Miss Gilbert was recalled, which is proof that the number was thoroughly enjoyed. The "Spring Song," by Mendelssohn, was rendered so exquisitely that it had to be repeated.

At the night concert there was a capacity audience, the attendance being estimated at more than 8,000, the largest in recent years. The most attractive program follows:

Monday Evening

Overture, Le Carnival Romaine.....H. Berlioz
Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio; andante con moto; allegro and allegro presto
Aria.....Bach
Serenade.....Haydn
Serenade.....Haydn
Concerto in G minor for Violin with Orchestra
.....Max Bruch
Prelude, andante moderato; adagio; finale, allegro energico
Sol. Marcosson
Excerpts from The Damnation of Faust.....H. Berlioz
Menuet des Follets
Danse des Sylphes
Marche
Conductor, Rene Pollain

The Beethoven Symphony, No. 5, was of special interest, in addition to the Concerto. A burst of applause greeted Sol Marcosson when he appeared. His playing of the wonderful Bruch number for violin and orchestra will be long remembered.

The second day brought two great concerts. The program of the afternoon included the following:

Tuesday Afternoon

Overture to Ruy Blas.....Mendelssohn
Ballet from Le Cid.....Massenet
Castilliane, Andalouse, Aragonaise, Aubade, Catalane, Madrilene, Navarraise
Aria—Cujus Animam (Stabat Mater).....Rossini
Robert Quait
Fantasie (La Traviata).....Verdi
Canzonetta.....G. Godard
Galop.....Glazounow
Excerpts from Sylvia.....Leo Delibes
Prelude; les Chasseresse
Intermezzo et valse lente
Pizzicati
Cortege de Bacchus
Conductor, Rene Pollain

Possibly the most popular number was the Fantasie from "La Traviata," if one can judge by the manifestation of the audience.

Robert Quait, tenor, sang "Cujus Animam," from "Stabat Mater," in a very beautiful way, being applauded by the assembly, including the orchestra and director.

For the evening concert came the D Minor Symphony of Caesar Franck, the most pretentious offering of the week, and its director may be congratulated upon the artistic result attained.

For the second part of the program was the performance of a cantata, "The New Earth," by Henry Hadley, with text by Louise Ayers Garnett. Chautauqua had the honor to give this beautiful work its second rendition, the premier having been conducted by the composer at Philadelphia on June 26. It was given at Chautauqua by the Chautauqua Choir, Jamestown Choral Society, Vahrah Hanbury, soprano; Emma Gilbert, contralto; Robert Quait, tenor; Fred Patton, bass; New York Symphony Orchestra, with Alfred Hallam conducting. It was indeed a creditable performance, and much credit is due Mr. Hallam for the acceptable way in which he presented it. The work deserves to be popular, as Mr. Hadley has given us a fine creation.

Wednesday Afternoon

Overture to Freischutz.....Weber
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Poco sostenuto, Vivace
Allegretto
Presto, presto meno assai
Finale, allegro con brio
Aria—Vio Io Sapete (Cavalleria Rusticana)..Mascagni
Vahrah Hanbury
Messidor, entr-acte Symphonique.....M. A. Bruneau
Aria—She Alone Charmeth My Sadness (Queen of Sheba).....Gounod
Fred Patton
L'Arlesienne, Second Suite.....G. Bizet
Pastorale; intermezzo; menuet; farandole
Conductor, Rene Pollain

The popular Der Freischutz overture opens the program, and another Beethoven No. 7 follows.

Miss Hanbury sang the aria, "Vio Io Sapete," from "Cavalleria Rusticana," in a charming manner, with excellent support by the orchestra. The beauty of the unison oboe and harp arpeggios added much to the beauty of the number.

Mr. Patton gave the "Queen of Sheba" aria, "She Alone Charmeth My Sadness." Mr. Patton has been a popular member of the quartet for July and the fact that this was his last appearance lent much interest to his number and he delivered it in an excellent manner.

The Menuet of the Bizet Suite proved to be the exquisite bit of the afternoon and was most beautifully given, the flute solo part being taken by Mr. Kincaid, a pupil of the well known Barrere.

Wednesday Evening

The attendance Wednesday evening exceeded that of any previous concert.

The Norwegian Rhapsody by Lalo, with its much color, was given a fine presentation.

Mr. Connell, head of the voice department of Chautauqua, gave "Eri Tu" from Verdi's "Masked Ball" an excellent presentation.

The Habanera by Charbrier, with its Spanish rhythm, delighted the audience.

The fanciful "Afternoon of a Fawn" (Debussy) in its alluring harmonies utilized all the less frequently used solo instruments.

The "Peer Gynt" Suite was given a marvelous interpretation by the orchestra under the guidance of M. Pollain. The audience would not be satisfied until he gave a repetition of the "Hall of the Mountain King."

Ernest Hutcheson gave a satisfying performance of the Grieg G minor Concerto.

The overture "1812," with here and there its reminiscent strain of the "Marseillaise," pleased to such an extent that, on request, it was repeated after the first number the next afternoon. In the opinion of many, this brought to a close the most interesting program to date.

Thursday, 2:30 o'Clock

Overture to Mignon.....Thomas
Intermezzo from Cyrano.....Damrosch
Symphonic Piece—Redemption.....Cesar Franck
Aria—Che faro Sanza (Orpheus).....Gluck
Miss Charlotte Peege
Fantasia (La Boheme).....Puccini
Namouna Serenade.....Lalo
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt

The second number scheduled was the Intermezzo from "Cyrano" (Damrosch), it being the entr'acte music. The violin solo was perfectly rendered by Mr. Guidi, concertmaster of the orchestra and interpreter for M. Pollain. He was recalled several times.

Miss Charlotte Peege, contralto, made a favorable impression at her initial appearance. She sang the aria "Che faro Sanza." She has a rich voice and gave the number with style and finish. She filled the large auditorium with apparent ease.

The orchestra was at its best in the Liszt Rhapsody, which was magnificently given.

Thursday, 8:00 o'Clock

Overture No. 3 (Lenore).....Beethoven
A Night at Lisbon.....Saint-Saens
Unfinished Symphony .....Schubert
Allegro moderato; andante con moto
Aria—Ah, for's e lui (Traviata).....Verdi
Miss Mildred Fass
The Wheel of Omphale.....Saint-Saens
Sounds of Bells.....Guy Ropartz
The Angelus
The Knell
Evening Bells
Espana Chabrier .....
The Answer of the Stars (first performance)..Converse
Tenor solo, Robert Quait
Chautauqua Choir, Organ
Conductor, Alfred Hallam

Of the evening's program the Unfinished Symphony stood out as one of the choice numbers, as always.

The soprano, Miss Fass, won the Chautauqua audience in this her first appearance in the "Traviata" aria. Miss Fass was equal to the difficult aria, her high notes being clear and musical and her technic irreproachable.

The three numbers included in the "Sounds of Bells" (Ropartz) was the premiere in America and created much favorable comment.

The Espana by Chabrier was possibly the most generally liked by the audience. Following came "The Answer of the Stars" (Converse), the first time in this arrangement, given by solo tenor with Chautauqua choir, symphony orchestra and organ, Robert Quait taking the solo and Alfred Hallam conducting. It is a beautiful number and was acceptably given. Mr. Quait scored an especially notable success.

Friday Afternoon

This program was the most popular one rendered since the symphony orchestra came to Chautauqua. Because of the many familiar numbers it was especially pleasing to the large gathering. Included were the "William Tell" overture, Damrosch's arrangement of Handel's Largo, most beautifully given, the concertmaster, Guidi, taking the violin solo, with the harp accompaniment by Lotito. One could not but wish that the charming "Xavier Rigaudon" (Dubois) had been given at another time, as it destroyed the effect produced by the Largo which one wished to retain.

Sudworth Frazier, the tenor, chose for his first appearance the "Flower Song" from Bizet's "Carmen," always popular.

Excerpts from "Lucia di Lammermoor" next delighted, then Gounod's "Ave Maria," followed by the Baccherini Menuet, which was repeated after insistent applause. This was also Harold Land's first appearance as bass soloist, and he sang "Even Bravest Hearts May Fail," from Gounod's "Faust," in a manner which pleased the audience. The last number, "The Furies" (Massenet), was in four parts, "Entr'acte," "Greek Dance," "Trojan Maiden Mourning Her Country," and "Finale."

The outstanding number was the "Greek Dance," the feature of which was the work of the two flutists, Kincaid and Passell, to the accompaniment of pizzicati strings.

In the evening the united choirs of Chautauqua and Jamestown Choral Society, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, organ and piano (Mr. Hallam directing), gave a satisfactory performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The chorus work was given with a finish seldom attained by so large a body of singers. The soloists acquitted themselves with credit. Mr. Vincent was at the organ and Mr. Shattuck at the piano. The latter deserves special mention not only for his work on this occasion but for his untiring efforts at rehearsals, where his intelligent co-operation is of great assistance to the conductor.

At the close of the "Elijah" Mr. Hallam received the Chautauqua flower shower from the choir.

It was with regret that we came to the last concert, given on Saturday afternoon. As the orchestra entered, the choir and audience, under Mr. Hallam's leadership, sang "See the Conquering Heroes Come" and to M. Pollain gave the Chautauqua salute, which visibly affected him, but after getting himself well in hand conducted as though inspired the closing program, a feature of which was the Concerto for organ, piano and orchestra, with H. B. Vincent at the organ and Austin Conradi, pianist.

TERRY FERRILL

Here is the first picture of Terry Ferrill that has been printed in any metropolitan music journal.

Young Mr. Ferrill is the violinist who, early this month, went to Peterborough, and there, at the N. F. M. C., walked away with the prize for violin playing.

TERRY FERRILL

This was something of a feat, inasmuch as the contest was open to all America and enlisted the attention of young violinists and their teachers the country over.

Terry Ferrill is just old enough to go into the contest, and he has so far won every contest in which he has appeared, this including several "preliminaries" to the final event at Peterborough.

He is a Kansas boy, a fine student along all lines, of splendid personality and appearance.

He is loyalty itself, and when he was told that his winning of the contest at Peterborough would bring him not only a money prize, but also the opportunity to study in New York or Chicago free of charge, he replied: "I have learned all that I know from Ralph Brokaw at Wichita, Kan. If he was good enough to prepare me in such a way that I could win this contest away from the pupils of all the other teachers represented here, it certainly seems to me that he is good enough for me to continue with for some time to come."

Particularly interesting is the resume of the musical activities of the college for the past year under the directorship of Herbert M. Bailey, baritone, who is known to many Chicagoans. In our "Press at Large" columns today may be found that part of the article referring particularly to Mr. Bailey.

Pupils of Louis Simmions Sing at Lake Hopatcong

Just opposite Ocean Grove, Lake Hopatcong shines brilliantly, with its superb valleys and hills—hotels a-plenty, golf, tennis, beaches in abundance. In Hopatcong lives Maxim Hudson, who owns every rock. Louis Simmions finds recreation in this attractive spot, where he owns a bungalow, and his pupils have to climb up the hills if they wish to be taught. On July 26, although most of his pupils were supposed to be on week-end vacations, the ambitious teacher rounded them up and asked them to appear in a recital which he arranged at the Durban Hotel. Many music lovers and amateurs in great numbers chose to listen to this musical program, which was opened by Miss Marianne Carell. This young lady received her first instructions from an American teacher in Berlin, who did not, it seems, bring out Miss Carell's voice in a manner to please the critics. When she returned from abroad Louis Simmions undertook the task of reshaping her voice. And what a change! The young lady can now stir you with her top notes, while the medium will arouse you from the most apathetic mood. Her singing of the "Tide" and "Love, the Pedlar," by Edward German, had exquisiteness in the interpretation and beauty of voice. Miss Carell made more of "Thanksgiving," by Allitsen, than the composer herself. Charming was MacDowell's "Thy Beaming Eyes." Hallett Gilberte's "Two Roses" would have pleased the composer very much. "Sing to Me, Sing" closed her cycle of songs, but the audience clamored for encores.

All the applause betsowed frantically on Joe Mendelssohn was duly deserved. This young lad possesses one of the most beautiful baritone voices I have heard in years. It is a fresh, pure, ringing and brilliant organ. His singing was delightful, because he has acquired an impeccable style. He enunciates clearly and convincingly. I heard a certain baritone, who is unjustly heralded as a great exponent of English songs, interpret "Khaki Lad" (Aylward), but this young chap should make his older colleague blush. Mr. Mendelssohn exhibited all the vigor of youth as well as all the expression required, and stirred his listeners to a point of enthusiasm. A group of oriental songs charmed us. There is a great future for "Joe," as his teacher likes to introduce this pupil.

Miss Hertha Harmon, a dramatic lyric soprano, possesses some unusual material for a career, but her singing is yet unsatisfactory. The aria from "Manon Lescaut" (Puccini) had the necessary vocal material, but not the singing exposition.

Mr. Olshansky has an excellent baritone voice, and modulates his voice and controls his breath, but he must rid himself of singing off key, as in "Flanders' Field." Otherwise his aria from "Benevenuto" (Diaz) was remarkable for resonance and beauty of voice.

Miss Wulner was at the piano.

Congratulations to Mary Jordan

Many a musician and artist believes that matrimony is one of the inspirations for a successful career. Mary Jordan, the sympathetic contralto, has joined the ranks of the "married" ones. On July 30 she became the wife of Lieut.-Col. Charles Clement Cresson, Judge-Advocate, United States Army. The ceremony was performed at the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, New York. Congratulations to both. They will be at their West End home on October 1.

"The Fall of Babylon" (a Movie)

D. W. Griffith returned to his vocational hobby—the historical film. Only somewhat revised, the story is practically the same old production of "Intolerance." Typical of Griffith, this production is huge, both in its photography and the mechanical devices employed in the movies. It must have cost some money to have all the hundreds of people simulate the battle of Cyrus against Belshazzar. Lovers of Biblical and historical facts and legends will enjoy this presentation, plus the oriental dancing by a corps de ballet, solo singing by a soprano and tenor, and incidental music furnished by a fair orchestra. Constance Talmadge acts the maiden of the mountains sometimes as the story requires, and somewhere she reminds one of the beautiful and the fascinating "Girl at the Beach." The balance of the cast is adequate. The film is presented at the George M. Cohan Theater.

Hans Kronold Still Busy

Good musicians never cease to play. Perhaps they would prefer a recess, but the public, capricious as ever, demands from them music.

Hans Kronold is actually on the run, in spite of Summer, and so he continues to delight with his instrument those who crave for his playing.

On July 29 and August 1 he played at Round Lake, N. Y., at two concerts under the management of A. Y. Cornell, the vocal pedagogue of New York. The concerts were given in the local tabernacle and were attended by an overflowing audience. Recalls and encores greeted the cellist.

Forrest Lamont, the young tenor of the Chicago Opera Association, was the high light of the second concert.

On August 22 Hans Kronold and his New York Ensemble will give a concert at Middletown, N. Y. On August 23 he will appear with his organization at the Golf Club of Schenectady, N. Y. When his appearances are not affected his time is devoted to teaching at Shelter Harbor, R. I.

Mr. Kronold boasts of a very brilliant pupil, one whose playing will create a furore. The name is Kenneth Forbes, hailing from Burlington, Vt. We hope to be able some day to comment on this pupil.

It is remarkable to note that Mr. Kronold is his own booking agent and he seems to be doing well. He deserves it, for in him America has a superb musician.

The divorced husband of Margaret Matzenauer took again the matrimonial oath on July 29, this time at Newark, N. J. He was married to Senorita Esthes Tallez of Havana, a daughter of a wealthy plantation owner. They will remain here for a while and in the Winter they will reside in Havana before their departure for Italy.

Ferrari-Fontana formerly was the tenor of the Metropolitan and Chicago opera. He is president of the Italian Musical League of New York.

"A Lonely Romeo" at the Casino

The masses will follow Lew Fields wherever he may chance to appear, and we all know the reason. This musical comedy is a Fields single-handed show. No one else in the performance distinguished herself, and no male actor furnished food for praise worthy criticism.

"A Lonely Romeo" is amusing because of Lew, but the music is nil. Pretty costumes, but no Ziegfeld girls; appropriate scenery, but no singing voices. The story of the show cannot be related, as there is no story to it. Perhaps Kern would have written some tunes, but Malvin M. Franklin and Robert Hood Bervers massed the kind of antiquated music heard in the cabarets. But what matters? Lew Fields is the show by all means. The Shuberts are the producers.

OLIVE NEVIN DECIDES TO ADOPT A NEW FORM OF PUBLICITY

"For a long time, during my two seasons before the Eastern concert field, I have felt that there needed to be a change in the usual accepted form now indulged feverishly by most of the artists before the public. I mean the custom of collecting, selecting and editing of all press notices from each engagement and then making the biggest possible splurge with them in the musical papers. In the case of the great among us, we do not have to be told those things—we know them. In the case of the near great we are not only not willing, but it annoys us to have it thrust upon us that the great are mere understudies to the near great. Then, as to the aspirants to greatness, those of us in our first few seasons, no one believes, even if we use type a page high, that we have received unprecedented and extravagant praise where the great and near great have failed to cause a riffle. I never blame the managers we beginners have to go tremblingly to see and beg recognition from for saying, 'Oh! I always have to hear a singer or artist before I believe they can do anything!'

"During these two seasons I have had such interesting times, and I am so happy in the work and have surely had my share of success. But I want so much to really share my experiences with all music lovers, and say that the little notices I have been sending in to these columns, made up of press notices and what people have said and thought of my work, are so very empty of what it all meant to me. This feeling has grown so that I know the letter which I always write home after a concert would be far more interesting to all, if for no other reason than its sincerity, so hereafter I intend to be my own press agent and write what I would write home. It must be so with every artist before the public. How much nearer and dearer they would all be if we could only catch a glimpse of that 'letter home' which each one, I am sure, must write, instead of the accounts that we do not believe of 'her marvelously perfect voice' or 'his masterly control of his instrument.'

Not only would the personality of the artist become dear to us, but we would get a wealth of information about the real and worth-while musical effort being made through organizations great and small all over America that could be gotten from no other source in just the same way, and it seems to me would be a most valuable boost to encouraging the growth and stability of our national music.

At East Liverpool, Ohio

"As an example, my last trip to East Liverpool, Ohio. There were good notices, but this is the account of the concert that I would like to have recorded. It was all so full of interest, and yet, East Liverpool is not on the so-called 'big managers'' map of worth-while engagements. Why, they would not take East Liverpool's word on the merits of a Jenny Lind if they read them. And yet there is musical effort in East Liverpool worthy of any big center. Here is what I wrote home:

"'We were soloists here last night, Rosa Hamilton and I, with the East Liverpool Male Chorus. The place is such a pretty little town, nestling on the sides of hills and overlooking the Ohio River, and it has the most amazing population of English people. When I inquired as to how this came about, I was told that this is the home of the greatest china and porcelain manufacturing concern in the country, and that English people had come over here in the early days, settled it, and with its growth in prosperity and demand more had come, until today stands this lively little city, ready to support worthy musical effort.

"'The Male Chorus flourishes and is so supported through the sincere and capable work of Miss Lysbeth Hamill. She is a thorough musician and a stirring spirit in the town, and it is surely an inspiration to watch her as she sits at her piano in the center of the stage, where she accompanies and conducts her chorus as they stand on tiers around her. The men pride themselves on the fact that they have no solo voice among them, and surely they have perfect ensemble and get effects that any Apollo Club in any big city might envy. Miss Hamill deserves as much credit for what she is doing in East Liverpool as does Walter Damrosch in New York for his there.

"'We each sang two groups of songs, and then two of our duets, and they were all lovely and enthusiastic about our work, and I think it was sincere, because they want us back next season.'

At the Roycroft Convention

"Another 'letter home' from East Aurora surely is of more interest than the newspaper notices too, although I have to thank this convention for my favorite notice, namely, that I am a 'musician, and a technician whose technic is neither frozen nor 'ossified':

"'The Roycroft Convention, which is always held over the Fourth of July week, is an annual joy to me. The singer cannot wrap herself up in pink cotton, but must join in, no matter what it does to her voice. Last year I went in all the fun, but came home without any voice to speak of, so this year, having learned my lesson, I was a bit more careful, and all there told me how much I had grown. This compensated for being a wall flower some of the time. There are always so many things to do and so many interesting people to do them with that self-denial of any of them is very hard on one's disposition. There are always two sessions entirely musical, usually the two Sunday afternoons, and this year these were especially delightful, because, besides the regular Roycroft Trio, Lillian Gearhardt, the Buffalo pianist; Martha Alexander, vio-

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

By ELIZABETH FORESMAN BAGG
(Copyright 1919 by Mary Elizabeth Bagg)

PART VI

The Made Voice and the Rescued Voice

I have spoken elsewhere of the young girl who goes into the study of vocal music for health reasons, rather than because she wishes to become a singer, and who sometimes surprises both herself and her teacher by the quality of voice which she develops. These cases are not as rare as you may imagine.

One of the most delightful phases of American life of today is the eagerness with which parents seize upon every opportunity for the culture and development of their children. In earlier days, a child had to give evidence of unusual talent before her parents would spend money for her on any branch of study. Now we see the money poured in profusion into every college, conservatory or art institute where youthful talent is encouraged to develop. From every little country town we see girls starting for the city, to study music, dramatic art, painting, etc., and while we know that only a small percentage of these will arrive at a definite achievement, we cannot honestly deprecate the coming of the others, for we know that another big percentage will gain an experience of life and a general culture which will be of the greatest possible benefit to them throughout their lives. Nothing that is well learned is lost; of that we are very sure. Many a girl who dreams of becoming a great singer or actress has made a better wife and mother because of that dream.

There are a number of reasons why people take up the study of vocal music besides the desire to be a great singer. One girl may wish to improve her health by means of the correct breathing which she learns in this way. Another, realizing that her speaking voice is thick and unpleasing, or perhaps fails to carry in public, finds that the clear enunciation which is absolutely necessary for good singing helps this speaking voice, while the same method which fills and enriches the singing tones performs a like service for those used in speaking. Another loves music and wishes to have the intelligent understanding of it which is best gained by actual study. An older woman wishes, perhaps, to know how to guide the voices of her children so that they may not suffer from strain in school singing.

Thus, there are many reasons, and when one of these people brings to a teacher a voice so small, so uncertain of pitch, so unmusical, perhaps, that it has never arrived at the dignity of being considered a voice, and when that voice, by patient work on the part of both teacher and pupil, develops and improves until it becomes one that may be listened to with pleasure in a recital hall or even in a drawing room, then we have what we sometimes call a "made voice." It was not made, for it was always there, but it has been developed from what was no nearly nothing that the word is almost permissible.

I think every teacher will bear me out when I say that we often meet in these pupils who have so little to begin with in the way of voice, an intelligence, a perseverance, and a genuine love of study that is often lacking in the more promising beginners. As it is seldom that these qualities go unrewarded, it is not strange that so many "made voices" turn out astonishingly well.

I have in mind one of these people, a woman who played the piano exceedingly well, but who never thought of developing her voice, which was small and not very interesting in character, until she was nearly thirty years old. Then the opportunity for study came and she seized upon it. The voice developed remarkably. It deepened and broadened into a rich contralto organ, and its possessor was, for a number of years, one of the representative oratorio and church singers of New York. Of course, all so-called "made voices" do not turn out as well as this one did. Many merely become pleasing in the home; but surely to sing delightfully in one's home is worth a great deal of work and study. Indeed, I know of no accomplishment which makes its owner so truly valued and loved by her friends as that of singing with taste and charm. I often hear women say: "No, I don't sing. I don't care to do anything that I can't do really well." This is praiseworthy in a sense. Truly, the woman who sings badly, but who will sing, should be consigned to outer darkness; but why make this "really well" depend on size of voice or on the fact of that voice having been given you in your cradle?

Those who recall the recitals given in this country by the Henschels, remembering their exquisite work, will agree with me as to what can be accomplished in the way of artistic singing with very little vocal equipment.

Following this idea of the "made voice," I have had middle-aged women come to me to learn to sing—women who in early life were not able to study—and it has been a joy to me to open to these women the door of music. Not that they developed voices of youthful richness or sweetness; but they did develop pleasant, well-placed, well-handled voices, with which they were able, with the aid of their ripened intelligence, to do artistic song singing, which was a pleasure to themselves and to their friends. Also, their study led them into an appreciation of good music which some of them would not have had otherwise.

It must not be forgotten that the very same exercises which place, build and enrich a great voice do that same work for the ordinary voice. They do another thing which is invaluable for the nonmusical person—they inculcate a sense of rhythm, just as dancing does. Each exercise has its definite and different rhythm, and the study of it must and will develop a feeling for that rhythm in the mind of the singer.

Of all "made voices," I believe the most charming are those of young girls. One develops them, little by little, from very tiny and terribly self-conscious beginnings, into sweet and delightful tones. Perhaps they may grow into something bigger and better; perhaps they will never pass the "dainty, pretty" stage; but in either case they are, given intelligence and temperament, altogether worth while.

Using the term "made voice," then, to denote a voice which started with almost nothing and developed into really something, we ought not to include under it, as we sometimes do, the voice which has, by study and singing, altered its character. A celebrated operatic tenor, a few years ago, started as a baritone and became, later in his career, a tenor. We have instances of contraltos who became sopranos. But to call these voices in their final resolution "made voices," or to believe that their ranges have actually been changed in some marvelous and sudden way, is, I believe, erroneous. My theory in regard to these voices is that they did not belong in the low range to begin with.

Many mezzo-sopranos have voices of unusual range. They possess the low, rich tones of the contralto, as well as some of the high notes of the soprano. They begin, we will say, as contraltos, because of these deep, low tones; but by constant work in the middle and upper registers, as well as by singing mezzo roles, such as "Kundry," "Dalila," "Carmen," etc., they develop the head voice, adding to it note by note, singing less and less in the chest register, until finally they become, in truth, mezzo-sopranos, and sometimes dramatic sopranos. They never, of course, become the actual or coloratura soprano. The voice has not been made over—it has merely developed into what it was intended to be in the beginning. The same applies to the tenor who never became a pure, lyric tenor, but remained always a robusto, or a tenor with strong baritone proclivities.

While speaking of these changed voices, one should dwell also upon the danger of such an attempt, if made by anyone not a thorough master of vocal science. In the cases which I have quoted the process was properly conducted and was successful; but a study of voice conditions will show many cases where exactly the same thing was tried and failed lamentably. If I may be pardoned for becoming personal for a few minutes and indulging in the somewhat dangerous proceeding of talking about myself, I will try to show you one case at least where such a failure on the part of unscrupulous teachers brought about a temporary loss of voice which might easily have become permanent.

I had what we call a natural voice, that is, it was a big voice, even when I was a child. It was also naturally well placed and built. Such things happen often, as every teacher knows. My voice was pure contralto, but had the big range of which I have spoken. I could and did sing the soprano arias, which I should never have been allowed to touch. For instance, I sang much of the music of Leonora, in "Trovatore"—a ridiculous thing for a contralto to attempt.

Of course, commercially, it pays to be a soprano. All the really big operatic parts are written for sopranos, or for mezzo-sopranos with high range. The average soprano can command a higher salary than the average contralto. There is every reason for a young singer who is operatically inclined to long to be classified in the ranks of the soprani. This was the bait which my early teachers held out to me, and which I, being young and greedy, swallowed eagerly. For over a year I persevered, forcing my upper tones by constant use, and when, very naturally, they rebelled at this outrage, forcing them a little more and calling upon my throat for reenforcement.

My natural medium and lower registers, the part of my voice that, as a contralto, I should have been depending upon for most of my work, I neglected and allowed to lie unused. I could, would and did sing soprano—for a year. Then came the catastrophe. As we all know, the natural law works out in the long run. The harder our protests, the harder the eventual reckoning. My voice was not a mezzo, and it resented the treatment which, scientifically managed, might have succeeded with a mezzo voice. In my case, the treatment was not scientific—it was merely brutal. Consequently, the voice broke. It was an ugly, dangerous break, in the neighborhood of C sharp, between the medium and the head voice. It grew worse and worse, until, combined with a timely cold or two, it became a case of partial paralysis of the vocal cords, and singing, as far as I was concerned, seemed to be at an end.

One does not, however, give up the ambition of a lifetime without a struggle. Add to this the fact that I came of a musical family, and that music was practically the only life that I knew anything about. I had been at it, either with my voice or at the piano, since I was seven years old. You can readily see what it meant to me to give it up. I never relinquished the idea that I was going to sing again. Not in opera, perhaps; not in my early life, as one usually does, but sing I would.

When rest and the doctor's care had brought the condition of my throat to a place where I dared to try, I went at it again. This time, however, with care. I went to teachers—I had to go to them, because I didn't know enough to teach myself—but, oh, how I watched those teachers! No one ever led me blindly, as they had before the catastrophe. While my experience had not been complete enough to show me what to do to build up my voice, it had taught me thoroughly what not to do in order not to break down what was left. I avoided high notes for a while as I would have avoided the plague.

I had left my low and medium voice, largely because no one had ever been sufficiently interested in it to do anything to it, and it remained in its natural state. With one teacher and another, getting a little help from one and avoiding trouble with the other, gradually the ugly break between the medium and upper voice began to mend. At first, whenever I needed a note above C sharp, I called upon my throat for help to steady it—it was so weak and wobbly. But soon I saw where that was leading me—back into the hole I was trying to climb out of. Finally, with a little help from this one, and a hint or two from that one, added to what my own sense was beginning to teach me, I learned the big truth about singing. That it is only by feeding the breath thus from the diaphragm to the voice, giving to the upper tones an expansion on the breath, that we are able to free the voice from the throat grip that is its ruin.

This is very simple to understand and very easy to demonstrate, but it is astonishing how few people there are who can give it in its completeness to the student. One of my teachers was constantly telling me that "the breath is everything," but, instead of explaining to me why it was everything, and how I could make it everything to me in my everyday exercises, he would give me scientific lectures on the structure of the throat, telling me with fascinating exactness what took place amid this physical apparatus when I did or did not do certain things. Correct, to be sure. He was a scientific soul and he knew his facts; but to me it was much like the story which Robert Louis Stevenson told of his attempt to tell Conan Doyle's tale, "The Engineer's Thumb," to a crowd of South Sea Islanders. It took him so long to explain to the intensely interested but non-scientific audience just what an engineer was that the story of the thumb was lost altogether.

I was much more benefited by the words of another teacher, a woman, who used to talk constantly of the freedom of the tone. Freedom was a word that I understood. It meant something to me. A tone that was free couldn't be clinched, or gripped, by the throat, or anything of that sort. It could be poured out on the breath and controlled by the action of the diaphragm. Another teacher, a woman also, showed me a little of what expansion of tone meant to the few notes which I had built of my head voice.

So I went on, gathering something here and something there, working still mostly linist, and me, the singer, we had Rosa Hamilton, the Pittsburgh contralto; Herman Gahwe, bass, from Buffalo, and Merritt Kyser, who played the French horn. This was the "battery," and we all enjoyed each other a lot.

"'Then the week's program included such a variety of speakers, and we musicians opened every lecture with a "once-around" musical program to suit the occasion as nearly as we could. The speakers were: Ted Robinson, author and poet; George Wharton James, the California naturalist; Joseph Lamb, teacher of correct speech; Elizabeth Towne, New Thought specialist; Joe Chappel, editor of the National Magazine; Gutzon Borglum, sculptor; Dr. Willard Carver, chiropractic doctor; Ernest Thompson Seton, animal lover; James Schermerhorn, editor of the Detroit Times; Dr. Frank Crane, friend to everybody; John Lentz, ex-congressman, and J. H. Donahey, with W. R. Rose, in chalk talk fun. So we were well entertained and repaid for having to wait a whole year between times. I have not told of the picnics, the ball games and the tramps through the woods, but they were good for the soul, and even if I, for one, almost had to stay in bed till the washwoman got through with my trunk, at home, I can hardly wait till next summer for the one good play in all the year.'"

AMERICAN CONSERVATORY

The closing recital of the summer at the American Conservatory featured David Bispham in two groups of songs and recitations, including Poe's "The Raven," the interpretation of which he has made famous. He was accompanied with exquisite skill and sympathy by Frederick Persson, whose work throughout the program was an unprecedented delight and satisfaction.

But there were others on the program besides Mr. Bispham who shared in the glory with an equal amount of credit. First in order of appearance among these were Heniot Levy, who played with unusual perception and delicacy even for one of his unparalleled rank in the roster of concert pianists. Mr. Levy is possessed of "perfection" technique and refinement of temperament which is apparent in all his playing. He played three Schumann numbers and two of his own Valses, which were fascinating in conception and character.

The flower duet (Madame Butterfly), of which audiences never tire, was done with suavity and fine insight by Miss Jennie F. W. Johnson and Mrs. Marie Partridge-Price. Mrs. Price was a guest soloist from California who endeared herself in grace and manner, both in the duet and in the solo numbers.

Miss Johnson's mellow, resonant voice displayed its customary qualities of which we never tire.

The program was one of the highest character and the greatest enjoyment.

Herbert M. Bailey at Huron College

Professor Herbert M. Bailey came to Huron College three years ago to take up his work as director of the school of music and during that time he has been the active factor in building up the institution to the high degree of excellence for which it is now noted. Mr. Bailey has a very pleasing baritone voice and his control and range in the use of it are remarkable. In addition to his position of director and teacher of voice he has been most generous with his services to several town and city organizations throughout the year. Professor Bailey possesses a strong yet at the same time pleasing personality which has won him a host of friends among townspeople and college folk during his stay in Huron. His patience and courtesy have also been responsible for much of his success as a director. Under his direction the Huron College School of Music has attained a high place of importance in the life of the college, and is recognized as one of the best music schools in the Northwest. For the efficient management of the school Mr. Bailey deserves much credit.—The Alphomega.

LETTER FROM FRANCE

Music News: We spent four weeks at Brest. Amongst our most pleasant memories we will cherish the excursions that we made into the surrounding country within a radius of about forty miles. These excursions are under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. They are made by auto truck and are entirely free to all men in uniform.

As I have already stated in a previous letter, this one feature alone—the various sightseeing trips conducted by the Y. M. C. A.—speaks eloquently indeed for the splendid work done by this organization in spite of all criticism, very little of which is really justified.

Our first trip in charming Brittany was to a small town by the name of Daoulas, about thirty-five or forty miles from Brest. We mounted our motor truck promptly at 8:30 a. m. in front of the "Flag Hut." There were about twenty-five of us—soldier boys, sailors, our congenial guide, our driver, Miss Tris, our pianist; Miss Browne, our soprano, and myself. It was a glorious spring morning, cool and sunny.

We quickly left the ungainly city of Brest behind us and for several miles traveled along the wooded banks of the beautiful Elorn River. Our first stop was at the town of Dirinon. Here we visited an old and quaint church, built in honor of St. Nonne, concerning whom a very interesting legend has been handed down by the peasants. The church dates back to the sixteenth century; is built in Gothic style, with marks of the transitional renaissance period. The spire was steep and of a style peculiar to this part of the country. In fact all of the churches of Brittany and France seem to be built very much along similar lines.

At Landerneau they pointed out to us the "house of three pillars" (two of the pillars now remain), which was supposed to have been built by the English when they controlled Brittany—so long ago that nobody knows just when. It was really only after we left Landerneau that we began to enjoy the charm of the country. Our course took us on an upward slope, and vista after vista unfolded itself to us as we ascended. A panorama of small fields, forests, hills and vales, in the freshest and most brilliant of colors such as is only possible in springtime with all nature budding and blooming.

It must be remembered that here and in most of the European countries the land is divided into small plats of perhaps an acre or several in extent. Intensive cultivation is practiced in an nth degree. The big farms surrounded by barbed wire fences as we know them in the United States are unknown and would be impossible here from the very nature of things. Each little plot is surrounded by an earth wall grown over with grass, hedges and bushes and lined with trees so closely and carefully trimmed that they carry nothing but a small round crown. Each patch again is of a different color from the other, according to the nature of the crop. Can you imagine the wonderful effect, the beauty and variety of coloring, when miles and miles of such lovely undulating country are gradually unfolded before your eyes as if by magic?

The person who has no appreciation of such beauty as this must be blind to all the finer things in life. And through it all one has constant evidence of the fine thrift of the French people. Everything is carefully gathered and used for firewood, and every blade of grass cut for fodder. Even the very tops of the rocky hillsides, which are too barren to be cultivated, are made to yield their share, for the short bushes and coarse grass is cut and dried and likewise used for firewood.

We arrived at our objective point, Daoulas, at about noon and stopped at the Hotel de Commerce. There we sat down to a long table, draped in spotlessly white linen, and enjoyed a two-course dinner for 3.50 francs. We then walked to the old Church of St. Anne. This is indeed an ancient relic, supposed to have been built about the year 515. It represents the remains of a Roman cloister which later on (in 1175) was raised to the dignity of an Augustinian abbey. The only original part remaining is the front of the church, the side walls and remainder having been rebuilt, but the old Roman form has been preserved, conveying the impression of great strength and ruggedness. Inside, large, roughly hewn timbers are thrown crosswise from wall to wall, supporting the vaulted roof, which is wood and painted a sky-blue. The whole makes a very curious effect. The square tower is detached and seems to belong to a later period, as it is built in Gothic style.

A very old lady was in charge of the grounds. After inspecting the church she took us into the walled courtyard of the ancient abbey. As we stepped inside the wall it seemed as if we had entered a bit of paradise itself. There was a square colonade of Roman and Romanesque pillars, with a fountain in the center, and all about, to the extent of several acres, most carefully kept flower beds, trees and shrubs.

A little to the side was the shrine of St. Anne, simply a tiny chapel, and adjoining it a spring surrounded by a wall of old masonry, with several steps at one end leading down to the pool, and at the other a small shrine with figures of saints. The spring is said to have miraculous powers, especially for ailments of the eyes. It was all delightfully picturesque, and long we lingered, loth to tear ourselves away from the enchanting spell. But our time was limited and we had to go.

Retracing our steps to the truck, we motored to the town of La Roche (the rock) to visit the ruins of an old castle built by King Maurice 'way back in the year 800. We climbed to the very top of the rock on which the old walls stand, clambering among the ruins and enjoying a splendid view of the adjacent country. The very air was filled with the romance of the past, and the ruins themselves, even in their complete desolation, seemed to look down upon the country below in haughty defiance. It did not need a great stretch of imagination to see in one's mind a proud knight on his fiery steed, all clad in burnished mail, prancing up to the drawbridge with his retinue.

The afternoon was far advanced and evening approaching, though the sun was still high, as the days are long in this part of the world. We arrived back in Brest in time for supper. We gave a concert that same evening at the Liberty hut ("Y") to about 700 men. Though we were tired physically, we were refreshed mentally, and I can truthfully say that we played with far greater vim and spirit than ordinarily. For had we not imbibed at Dame Nature's inexhaustible fountain of inspiration?—and had we not been carried back in spirit to the dim past when men lived as saints and fought and died even as they do now, though under vastly different conditions?

This, then, is a poor description of just one of the excursions it has been our good fortune to take. And yet many of our soldier boys—in fact the vast majority of them—are leaving France with a wrong attitude of mind and with bitterness in their hearts, decrying the country and belittling its people. The truth is, though many have been here a long time, they have really seen very little of the country itself outside of their military camps and the towns and cities immediately adjoining. They simply have not made the effort to see it in reality, just as little as they have tried to acquire the French language, with the result that they do not understand the people and have not met the right kind. They imagined the French would come to them, and in this they have been mistaken. For France owes America no more (and probably far less) than we owe her. Besides, to my mind, there is nothing so tiresome and so destructive of a man's finer perceptibilities as a prolonged stay in a military camp. This is particularly true of the boys who are in the impressionistic age—from 18 to 25 or 26.

I have even met secretaries from the several welfare organizations who were strongly afflicted with this attitude of mind, and at least one of them, whose name and organization I shall not disclose, is strongly pro-German.

However, these excursions conducted by the "Y" are doing a great deal to bring about a better understanding and appreciation on the part of our men. But alas! there will always be those "who have ears and hear not, and eyes and see not."

JACQUES THIBAUD

Jacques Thibaud has been engaged to play at Bar Harbor, Me., at the Building of Arts, on August 2, and at Green Gables, Magnolia, Mass., on the 5th.

He came up to town the other day from the shore for a change of rain. The scenery at Long Branch had already begun to mold, and as for playing the violin, one might better have studied the oboe. That, at least, is an all-year-round instrument, a kind of boon companion which takes the ups and downs of life in good nature. A violin is too much the delicate coquette, who must have a special climate made to order and a new string to her bow every now and then.

However, Mr. Thibaud feels it is too late to change now, and for the coming season will be known, as usual, as "the French violinist."

SIMPLICITY IN SINGING

in the middle voice, building a note at a time of the head voice, trying this and that, clinging to anything that gave me a free tone, and putting aside anything that hindered it. Thus I built up a method to fit my case, and finally, after years of work and study, during most of which time I had been singing in public, I got my voice back again, every bit as good as it had been in my girlhood. When I studied in Paris under Mr. Jacques Buohy, he said to me: "Who did your voice building?" I told him—that is, I told him how I had dug it out bit by bit, helped here and there by others, but keeping control of the work myself, guided by bitter experience. "Well," he said, "whoever did it, it is remarkably well done."

All of which has confirmed me in my belief that, after all, the simple and direct method of singing is the foundation of good voice work and can be given to the beginning pupil in a way to enable her to see results from her first lesson. Thus, the first rescued voice that I had to deal with was my own. Since then I have met many that needed rescuing, and have done, I hope, my share of the work. Every teacher meets these pathetic cases. Sometimes the trouble is slight and easily remedied; sometimes it is, as mine was, serious, even to the point of physical trouble. My case was unusual for a contralto. As a general rule, a contralto comes to grief from carrying her chest tones too high, allowing them to overlap into the medium register, and the resulting break will be, of course, between these two registers—not, as mine was, between the medium and head registers. The remedy is, however, the same—worked out by means of the exercises given in our earlier chapters—to be used, in these cases, however, in the middle and chest registers, working down instead of up, as I had to do in my case.

The most serious case of this sort that ever came my way was that of a woman of middle age who had lost her voice under circumstances similar to those under which I lost mine. She, too, had had a big contralto voice, had sung in church with much success, and had finally lost her voice through the malpractice of certain teachers. This had resulted in a total collapse of voice. Like myself, she had had various forms of throat trouble, aggravated by each new cold, as such things are aggravated, until at last she had lost not only her singing voice but her speaking voice as well. For a year and a half she did not speak, but wrote upon a pad like a dumb person. Then, gradually, the speaking voice had returned, under medical care, but the singing voice, so said the physician, was gone forever.

For a number of years the patient accepted the verdict, and, glad to be able to speak again, gave up all thought of singing. As it happened, she had known me at the time of my vocal breakdown, and had not seen me for a number of years. One day she heard me sing. She could scarcely believe her ears. I was, I suppose, a sort of vocal Lazarus to this poor soul. At any rate, she came to me and asked me to work with her voice. It was an experiment that few teachers could have resisted, I believe; at all events, I could not, and we began work.

It was like teaching a baby to walk. You know how carefully that must be done in order to protect the little legs from overweight. So with this pupil's voice; the little exercises used in connection with the breath, very carefully, ten minutes at a time, two or three times a day, did the work. Always I held her thought to the poising of the tone, high in the mask of the face; never in the throat; feeding the tone with breath controlled by the diaphragm; never gripping the upper tones, when we finally came to upper tones, but expanding them on the breath. We worked first in the medium voice, which is the "safety first" of this work, and by building up and down from this point we finally emerged with a voice. It wasn't the fresh voice of her girlhood, but it was a good, usable voice, one that could sing songs well and give pleasure to others. Moreover, we did it in six months. Later she taught. It was a case of a rescued voice if there ever was one.

Dr. Holbrook Curtis speaks in his book also of his work of rescuing hurt voices by a process somewhat similar to the one I have just described.

It is by such demonstrations as these that one learns to depend on a good method and to have the courage to apply it to the various cases that come one's way. For although each pupil presents a new case and demands an individual treatment, the underlying principles of the work remain the same. Just as all really capable teachers teach the same method, although you will find that each one has his own manner of approaching it—his own exercises, his own vocabulary. When a teacher claims to have originated the "one and only method" or to have revived it alone from the darkness of the ages, he is a very good teacher to keep away from. He claims more than any individual is entitled to claim. Also, when you get away from these principles, or neglect them for the supplementary branches of interpretation, style, etc., you are not a safe teacher for a young student.

Refinement of Tone and Delicacy of Touch

Are the Distinguishing Features of the

Baldwin Piano

IT is these features that lend confidence to an artist when playing a recital. Nothing is so inspiring to even the amateur as the sympathetic tone and the wonderfully responsive action of the Baldwin.

Editorial

PASSING COMMENT

Since the printing in Music News of the remarkable program for the National American Music Festival to be held at Lockport, N. Y., next month, the editor has received a number of protests, verbal and in writing, because of the fact that the names of certain composers were not found in the list.

Some of these names are so prominent that it is a decided wonder that they were not chosen by one or another of the Lockport artists, and others of them are so comparatively unknown that they could hardly have expected place.

In spite of omissions, however, it seems to me that the program is a remarkably big and important one, and will do a great deal toward furthering the cause of the American composer and artist, just as did also the three festivals already held at Lockport.

And, in the case of those composers whose names have not found place this year, there is in mind a very definite reason for the omission, and this reason has nothing to do with the real values of the composers mentioned, but rather with the fact of nonpublicity, either of themselves or their music.

The new times in which we are living are very definite (if perhaps cruelly exacting) in certain commercial aspects, which cannot be ignored.

Real values, either in composition or other high-grade work, are recognized readily enough when they are clearly (or perhaps one should say forcibly) brought to attention, but the bare fact of merit alone carries not at all.

The performing artist is absolutely helpless unless he have publicity.

The public is too busy to study out for itself the extent of his technic or his art, but must needs be told, plainly, patiently and continuously, the facts.

If told long enough and plainly enough, the public will at least pay attention temporarily, and if the facts are found to be as stated in publicity matter will, inevitably, accord support.

Singers and instrumentalists who advertise today and who secure attractive publicity to themselves are succeeding.

The others might just as well stop at the very beginning of the career they are hoping for, for they will never attain it.

And it is the same with composers. Many of those whose songs are on the Lockport program have been well advertised, and it is safe to say that each one of them has employed all the means he knew to secure publicity for himself and his work.

Of course he must, absolutely must, prove merit as he goes along, or else he will drop out almost anywhere along the race course, but undeniable is it that publicity does and must accompany his every effort if it is to even have a chance of success.

To state the kind or the manner of advertising or of publicity necessary is no part or intention of this article, but it is certainly in place to point out and to emphasize that in this stirring moment of the world's history everyone who wishes success must find publicity for himself and his work by some means or another, and if he does not do that there is no hope of success.

Look out and not in, and—
Lend a hand"

Three decidedly charming personalities came to attention one hot morning last week when the editor made a visit to a North Side church to listen to one of the Class Lessons of Mrs. Carrie Louise Dunning, whose "System" of music study has attracted so much attention and which was under exposition at the moment.

Mrs. Dunning, fine and generous in many ways, has the especially beautiful impulse to allow her every graduate to review (without expense) the course of lessons on each of her annual reappearances in the vicinity, and therefore on the morning in question there was present in the cool, airy room not alone many tables full of advanced and experienced teachers, enjoying their annual "review," but also the class of the moment, which was addressed by Mrs. Dunning constantly as "little girls," for, having a keen mind for suggestive imagery, she believes in teaching her system to its future propagandists in just the way she expects them to put it to the young children of their future classes.

Mrs. Dunning is then the first of the three charming personalities, and she is indeed a fine woman, and interesting to the limit.

So logical is she that she cannot endure any tiniest infraction of the rules of good reasoning, nor will she permit even the smallest mistake in nomenclature.

Many music terms and expressions, hallowed by long usage, are repudiated by her in favor of those more in accordance with the actual facts in the case.

Not alone does she, in her method, offer quick solution of the most intricate of the usual "problems," but also she insists always that each step must lead to absolutely good vocalism and good pianism.

Manner, method and illustration of any kind of music, simple though the immediate point may be, is always, with her, put in such a way that it conforms to the technic and the style of the greatest in the art.

Mrs. Dunning is a wonderful word painter, and she believes implicitly in mental pictures. She understands full well the real purpose of education and knows that if it be merely a "pouring-in" process nothing worth while will result.

Therefore, each thing done in her classes must be logical and properly progressive in alignment with every other fact presented. And all this is backed up with a logical reason for every step taken.

And when these basic principles are followed it is amazing how quickly the seemingly "big" questions fall into easy analysis and mastery.

For instance, "Rhythm" is perfectly easy to teach if you know just how, and Transposition is no trick at all if you approach it properly.

And all this must be very exhilarating to the members of a Dunning Normal Class even as it is fascinating—always—to me, a visitor, and all of it proclaims Mrs. Dunning not only a charming personality—for she is that in appearance and manner and general education—but it proves her also a thoroughly useful one.

The second of the group of personalities under consideration is Mrs. Harriet Bacon MacDonald.

Mrs. MacDonald is by choice a Dunning advocate and enthusiast, and she was, at the class lesson heard last week, a first lieutenant throughout.

But she is distinctly and pronouncedly a personality on her own account and she, too, is as charming as she is efficient.

A fine pianist and accompanist is Mrs. MacDonald—a splendid speaker, an excellent writer, and, above all, a pedagogue with the finest sort of mind, the biggest kind of heart and a thoroughly alive and very much-in-evidence brain.

To see Mrs. Dunning and Mrs. MacDonald together engineer a normal class through one of the lessons is a treat and an inspiration.

And on last Friday it chanced that the kaleidoscope of fate brought into conjunction with these two a third personality, for Mrs. Isa Maud Ilsen, who was spending a few days in the city, had been asked to speak to the girls of the class for a few moments at the end of the lesson, and she certainly justified herself in delaying the luncheon hour for most of them three-quarters of an hour.

Mrs. Ilsen is in charge of all the music in the United States military hospitals, through government appointment, and she has just concluded a course of lectures on the subject at Columbia University, New York.

Brought up in the hospital environment, with strong predilection toward music and some skill in manipulation, she was the pioneer in bringing music into hospital life in America, and so greatly has she developed the idea and so skillfully did she apply it in war times that countless thousands of American soldiers who were compelled to lay off for longer or shorter time in military hospitals will probably bless her memory to the day of their deaths.

It is impossible here and now to tell you a tithe of the points she discussed or the things she said, but it was all charmingly done, and the matter of it all was as fascinating and as illuminating as it was charming in manner of presentation by Mrs. Ilsen.

She pointed out the great services that musicians had given in the hospitals during the war and the fine effects of the music presented, but she believes now, even as does this writer, that all such work should in the future be under government appointment and control and that all musicians chosen for such service should be paid for it.

What she told at this time as to suitability of program for such work was an eye-opener and should have been heard by every young person who thinks that the way to please the sick, the old and the decrepit is to sing or play to them lugubrious music.

"Instead," said Mrs. Ilsen, "nothing should be used but the brightest and the best—nothing but what is relished and assimilated, and not even what is often really asked for unless psychologically it is just what should be given."

A very interesting booklet, just to hand, is devoted to the Indianapolis News Newsboys' Band, and a reading of this seems to place the organization in a super-exceptional class.

The band is under the direction of J. B. Vandaworker and is maintained, of course, by the News, for the benefit of its carriers.

Since 1900 Mr. Vandaworker has trained 1,300 newsboys in band work, and the finished achievements have been notable.

The encore played by Mr. Eddy in his recent South Side organ recital, and which we promised to tell you about, was "The Holy Boy," by John Ireland. It was a charming piece as played at this time. Mr. Eddy's copy was given him by Walter Kramer and is the only one in the United States.

Music News is in receipt of a telegram conveying the sad news of the death of Eugene Sullivan.

Young Mr. Sullivan, a tenor of Milwaukee, was a pupil of Iva Bigelow Weaver, and together with his sister, Miss Josephine, had made a great success in the charming ensemble known as the Sullivan Duo.

Recently they were heard in Chicago at the Hippodrome and the Pantheon theaters, and their engagements had taken them into many other of the best vaudeville houses as well as to the fulfillment of many fine concert engagements.

Eugene Sullivan had a fine personality as well as a beautiful voice, and his death, in very early manhood, is a distinct loss to the music world at large as well as a great sorrow to the many who knew him personally.

A letter from Mary Highsmith-Lyding tells of a humorous situation of one day recently, when Barbara Wait came to call on her at her Chicago home, and the two singers, soprano and alto, filled in a very happy hour trying over some new duets.

After Miss Wait had gone home Mrs. Lyding's neighbor across the hall came in and said: "I kept my door open the whole afternoon, for I do enjoy hearing that lady help you to sing."

Two other letters, following, speak for themselves:

CHAUTAUQUA EXPERIENCES

A letter from a Chicago cellist:

Music News: Chautauqua work is full of thrills, as I can testify after three years of experience. One meets old friends unexpectedly, or loses a trunk, or finds some point of literary or historical interest in an out of the way corner. We have visited the Gene Stratton Porter home near Rome City, Ind., and have spent a night in a room once occupied by Abraham Lincoln, in a little town on the east bank of the Mississippi river, where he debated with Stephen A. Douglas.

On one occasion a broken cello bridge created a serious problem, because music stores and instrument repairers are not to be found in the type of towns on our circuit. However, there was a violin maker, 80 years old, living in this particular town who might be able to help us, temporarily at least. He happened to have three cello bridges in his shop, one of which would do, and although it was half past 10 o'clock at night he started to fit the bridge to the cello, while he talked about his violins. He makes them of wood that is not generally used. One of them has a top made of California redwood and a back made from the wood of the osage orange. They are beautifully made, and the tone which our violinist, Elsa Becker, produced from them is rich and mellow, without the "stiffness" of many new violins.

The cello bridge was finished at the same time that the violin maker's family returned from the chautauqua program, and another half hour was spent in trying it out in a short recital for cello alone. It is still with me and is giving good satisfaction.

A LETTER FROM M. H. HANSON

Music News: May I not ask you to publish a most emphatic denial of the totally unfounded rumor, which is being arduously circulated, that Leo Ornstein will leave America shortly, and that he will concertize in Europe. For what purpose such a rumor should have been started and spread baffles my understanding. It is true that an offer was received from Europe. It was rejected. But I can most positively state Mr. Ornstein will remain in this his homeland and fulfill every one of the contracts signed on his behalf for the coming season.

I thank you for giving me the space in your valued columns.

(Signed) M. H. HANSON.

Friday evening of last week Osbourne McConathy presented students from the classes in Conducting and Orchestration in a program at Fisk Hall. Mr. Seder of the faculty gave organ numbers by Widor and Tschaikowsky with brilliant style. There were spirited readings by the Summer School Orchestra, and a good sized chorus to illustrate the actual work. Mrs. Hatswell-Bowman sang the soprano solos in the anthems with skill, as did Mr. Beery of the class 1918.

With its canyons, high jagged rocks, river and some dozen springs it charmingly offers a genuine joy to the real lover of the outdoors. It affords also every opportunity to the all-round athlete that Miss Jones is.

She writes that she finds real inspiration in working up new songs and that it is the ideal place to get the real feeling for the "Song of the Robin Woman" from Cadman's "Shanewis," about which she is most enthusiastic and is planning to use on her programs.

JAMES HAMILTON SINGS AT PONTIAC AND ORCHARD LAKE, MICH.

James Hamilton, tenor, of the University School of Music, and M. C. Wier, violoncellist, spent the week-end, July 31-August 3, at the home of Mrs. P. P. Hoffman, the Oaks, Pontiac, where music was the order morning, noon and night. Under the spell of the great forest trees and the quiet old home, that breathed an air of repose and elegance that seemed almost out of place in this age of post-bellum rush and anxiety, both artists were inspired to almost outdo themselves.

Mr. Hamilton not only delighted his audience by his superb singing, but fairly overwhelmed them with the variety of effects at his disposal. He gave in the most convincing manner such numbers as Handel's "Where'er You Walk"; recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still"; aria, "Waft Her, Angels"; aria, "Celeste Aida," "Una Furtiva Legrima" (Donizetti), "Vesti la Giubba" (Leoncavallo), where he displayed to the fullest the great power of his voice, its rare quality, along with his infallible judgment as a singer, while in the negro dialect songs, such as Burleigh's "Bye an' Bye," "Weeping Mary," "Didn't It Rain?" and Homer's "Banjo Song," he displayed a skill not possessed by one in a thousand.

M. C. Wier played the Boellman Variations, the Saint-Saens Concerto and the Sonato of Rachmaninow, Opus 19, and a great number of smaller pieces. He was commended for the beauty of his tone and for the lightness and ease with which he handled the lighter and more rapid passages.

Singer and player were alike fortunate in having as accompanist Mrs. George Jacobs, who played with rare sympathy and understanding. Although reading at sight, she played the difficult piano part of the Rachmaninow Sonata with a verve and abandon that was as delightful as it was surprising.

On Friday the program was repeated at the beautiful home of George S. Hodges, at Pine Lake.

WINIFRED BYRD

Winifred Byrd, the pianistic sensation of last season, is now summering at Belmar, N. J., prior to her transcontinental tour of next season. She is a devotee of rowing, swimming, tennis and other outdoor sports, believing the same necessary to fit her for her concerts and recitals, which are being rapidly booked by Jules Daiber. She will appear in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland and Seattle and other cities on the coast in joint recital with Clarence Whitehill; also with several of the orchestras. She is also booked with many clubs and universities in the South, where she achieved great success last season, and is very much in demand. Her other bookings will include appearances at Chicago, Boston, Scranton, Harrisburg and Altoona during the months of January and February. She will also be heard in two recitals at Aeolian Hall, New York City.

THE DEATH OF RUGGIERO LEONCAVALLO

By JOSEPH DE VALDOR

One of the big four composers of modern Italy died in Rome on July 9. A cable from the Eternal City informs of Ruggiero Leoncavallo's death. He bolonged to the quartet of the four operatic composers of modern Italy, consisting otherwise of Puccini, Mascagni and Giordano.

Had he written only "Pagliacci," his fame would not pale. Though Leoncavallo was a semi-prolific composer, his only successful work was the two-act opera, "Pagliacci." His colleague, Mascagni, was always considered a superior composer, but both acquired fame at the same hour. A prize was offered for the best one-act opera. "Cavalleria" was given first honors, not only because its music was of a more tuneful fiber, but for the requirements imposed by the musical jury. A one-act opera and a good one should have received the prize. Mascagni, clever enough to inject an intermezzo into his opera, received the first honors, and Leoncavallo, with "Pagliacci," received the second prize, naturally, due to the beautiful score of his two-act opera.

Leoncavallo made two visits here. Once he came with an orchestra, so called, from the Scala of Milan, but the inferior quality of his musicians contributed to a complete fiasco. In 1913 he conducted the premiere of his opera, "Zingari" ("The Gypsies"), at the Chicago opera. The composition was not received with enthusiasm, but applause was bestowed upon the composer because of having scored with "Pagliacci."

Ruggiero Leoncavallo was born in Naples, Italy, in 1856, and studied at the conservatory of his native city. His next popular opera to "Pagliacci" is "Zaza," which will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House the season of 1919-1920. Other operas written by the Neapolitan composer are: "I Medici," "Cesare Borgia," "La Boheme," and "Manon." With only one successful opera, he will still be able to retain his fame.

HANS HESS STUDIO NOTES

Although Mr. Hess has been devoting the summer mostly to his repertoire work for the coming season, he has had to devote some of his time to teaching. Students who have studied with him this summer are as follows: Miss Fern Betts, Chicago; Mr. J. Barron, Chicago; Mr. F. Brasor, Chicago; Miss Hattie Burns, Chicago; Mr. L. Businger, Chicago; Mr. F. Evers, Chicago; Mr. H. Grant, Chicago; Miss Goldie Gross, Chicago; Miss E. Hagberg, Chicago; Mr. E. Hartmann, Kansas City; Mrs. Kricks, Chicago; Mr. Ted Kussman, Galesburg; Mr. Krecji, La Porte; Mr. Kollmeyer, Chicago; Miss Ethel Murray, Chicago; Mr. Theo. Ratzer, Chicago; Miss Johnson, Chicago; Mr. Paul Morrison, Chicago; Miss Beulah Rosine, Chicago; Miss Ethel Tomlin, Chicago; Mr. James Strauss, Chicago; Albert Feigan, Chicago; Sterra Feigan, Chicago; Minnie Ratzer, Chicago; Ivy Hunt, Chicago; Lillian Rehberg, Chicago; Nathan Zimberoff, Chicago.

Those who are filling important positions in Chicago are Barron, Brasor, Businger, Gross, Hartmann, Kollmeyer. Theodore Ratzer is meeting with exceptional success on his tour with Mrs. MacDermott. Miss Murray is on tour with Mr. Frederick Morley, pianist, and Mr. Michaelis, violinist. Miss Hagberg and Miss Rosine are both on Chautauqua. Miss Anne Slack and Miss Miriam Little, both from the Hess Studio, are meeting with success on Chautauqua. A former pupil of Mr. Hess, Miss June McAteer of Pittsburgh, is playing at the Lockport Festival in September. Mr. Desmond Sullivan, principal cellist of the Philharmonic Orchestra, is holding a summer position in Colorado Springs. Among his junior class Mr. Hess has some unusually wonderful talent. Mr. Hess' fall term will commence September 8. Owing to the big recital season ahead of him, his classes will necessarily be limited.

Last season Anne Slack won the Lake View Musical Club scholarship. The same honor fell to Mr. Ratzer this season.

THE MILLERS AT THE STADIUM

Recent successful soloists at the Stadium in New York were Nevada van der Veer Miller, contralto, and Reed Miller, tenor.

Both sang important arias as well as several encores and their success was exceptional.

———♯♯♯———

Yon—Pietro Yon, a noted Italian musician, a celebrated organ virtuoso and the most brilliant and prolific writer of organ music in the United States, has aroused much interest in musical circles by the announcement of a transcontinental concert tour. Mr. Yon has succeeded where all others have failed in placing the organ in its proper sphere as a popular instrument for concerts. Heretofore, or largely so, it has been restricted to church concerts, but this master has demonstrated that its possibilities are boundless for classical and popular music as well as religious. Indeed, its versatility and originality make it distinctively popular in its appeal.

———♯♯♯———

Harder—A new organ composition called "O Beautiful Night" (Funeral Song of the Gods), by Erwin E. Harder, has been sent out by the E. E. Harder Publishing Company, Chicago.

ANNA LOUISE GILLIES

Another story of the charming Irish harps which make the work of Miss Anna Louise Gillies so unique and interesting. This one is an echo from the Centennial Parade of July 4 in Flint, Mich.

Miss Gillies had long waited for just such an opportunity to present her harps to the public in a picturesque way. It reminded her of her own childhood days when she herself saw a harp for the first time to hear the joyous exclamations of the children who were among the onlookers. Six of Miss Gillies' little pupils appeared in the pageant and, although the float which carried them cost very little in comparison to many others, none were more impressive and beautiful, for the harps, together with the small harpists, presented a most picturesque and charming appearance.

The children who appeared (all pupils of Miss Gillies) were: Nell Stuart Saville, whose picture was published recently in our columns; Esther Blackinton, Elsie Ruby, Gene Watson, Madeline Pound, and Ruth Bentley.

This splendid work of Miss Gillies is expanding continually and constantly achieving greater and well-deserved success. She has presented the Clark Irish Harp recently at the Southeastern High School and Duffield School, Detroit; Presbyterian Church, Royal Oak, Mich., and at the Opera House, Lenton, Mich.

LOCKPORT, N. Y.

The plans for the great American Music Festival on September 1 to 8 are well under way and a splendid attendance is assured.

The opening session will be on Monday, September 1, at 10 a. m., and the last one on Sunday evening, September 7, at 8:15.

Gunster—Frederick Gunster, tenor, will appear at the National American Music Festival at Lockport, N. Y.

WHAT THE CHICAGO OPERA ARTISTS ARE DOING THIS SUMMER

Yvonne Gall has gone to the north coast of France. After operatic engagements in the south of France she is spending two months bathing, boating and fishing, with "occasional excursions in the realm of opera."

Mary Garden is summering at Monte Carlo. "I love the Riviera summer," she writes. Besides, Monte Carlo, free from visitors and roulette fiends, is an ideal place for study, and Mary Garden is working hard on several new roles.

Galli-Curci is in Connecticut enjoying a well-deserved rest.

Rosa Raisa has gone to Italy after her successful appearances in Mexico.

Tamaki Miura has gone to South and Central America to appear with the Bracale Opera Company.

Dorothy Jardon is at Bayside, L. I., studying new roles.

Alessandro Dolci spent July in London as a member of the Covent Garden Royal Opera. He will then return to Italy for a two months' rest before sailing for America.

Alessandro Bonci is at the seashore.

Eduardo Di Giovanni is using his summer vacation to teach his eight-year-old daughter the language of his native land. "My daughter does not like English," he says, "and the reason she gives for her dislike is the fact that 'papa always scolds me in English.'"

Charles Fontaine, after a strenuous three months at the Opera Comique on top of his American engagement, has gone to Belgium, his native country, where, in a quiet country spot, he intends to pass the summer composing and studying new roles.

George Baklanoff is planning a transcontinental tour in his automobile. He intends to carry all the paraphernalia for camping out, and declares that he will pursue the study of new roles beneath the desert stars of California.

Hector Dufranne is putting his house in order at Chatou, near Paris. When the job is done he expects to go, with his wife and children, to Royan in the south of France, where the fishing is good and the bathing is still better.

Carlo Galeffi began his vacation about the first of July after his engagement at Bilbao, Spain. He will then make a trip of the Italian lakes in his motor boat.

Louis Hasselmans is planting a vegetable garden, by way of vacation, on his property at Asnieres, near Paris. Later in the summer he expects to go to Italy.

Pavley and Oukrainsky are spending the month of August with one hundred pupils at South Haven, Mich. Here they will live on a farm with a beautiful swimming beach all their own.

Cleofonte Campanini has taken a month's rest at Salsomaggiore, where he owns an estate. The first of August found him in Parma, where he is giving a two weeks' season, during which will be presented the prize-winning operas of the Mrs. McCormick contest. He expects to be back in America by October 1, in time for the rehearsals for the preliminary season of the Chicago Opera Association.

———###———

Rhys-Herbert—Dr. M. Rhys-Herbert of Minneapolis, who has been making a visit in New York, was a Music News caller on Friday.

BOHUMIR KRYL TAKES AN AEROPLANE RIDE

Bohumir Kryl, the world's famous bandmaster, made a flight in an aeroplane from Kalamazoo, Mich., to Traverse City, a distance of one hundred and ninety miles, in two hours and three minutes, to pay a day's visit to his charming family at Lake Leelanau, where they have a summer home. He is the father of the youthful phenomenal pianist, Marie Kryl, also Josie Kryl, the brilliant young violinist.

Green—Raymond Green, tenor, who is studying with Salvini in New York, and for whom a fine career is predicted, was a Music News visitor on Saturday. Mr. Green was en route to New York from Wisconsin, where he had just given several successful recitals.

HESS STUDIO NOTES

Hans Hess, whose success on the concert platform is well known, gives a part of his time to teaching. He has in his class many professionals. Theodore Ratzer must be given special mention, for he has unusual talent. He is the winner of the Lake View Musical Club Scholarship. He is at present on tour with Sybil Sammis MacDermid. Many of Mr. Hess' professional pupils that have continued working throughout the summer are Mr. Kollmayer, James Strauss, Paul Morrison, Miss M. L. Johnson, Fern Betts, L. C. Businger, Joe Berryman, Mrs. Krick, Hattie Burns, Theodore Ratzer, Ethel Murray, Anne Slack, Beulah Rosine, Goldie Gross, Ezra Hartmann, Wilber Grand, Frederick Brazor and Elizabeth Hagberg. Among the younger pupils studying this summer are Nathan Zimberoff, Wilber Piske, Lillian Rehberg, Minnie Ratzer, Ivy Hunt, Sterra Feigen and Albert Feigen.

MARIAN ANDERSON

In a recent Music News review of a Chicago Musical College concert there occurred this sentence: "The last vocal number was given by a young contralto, who put her big voice into the well-known 'Adieu, Forests' (Tschaikowsky) and gave an impressive rendering. She has unlimited possibilities, vocally."

The singer referred to was Miss Marian Anderson, who came from Philadelphia to Chicago to study during the Summer term at the Chicago Musical College with Oscar Saenger.

Miss Anderson is the possessor of a very nice personality as well as an exceptional voice, and her great success is freely predicted by all who have heard her work.

Dorr—The forty boys of Emmanuel choir of La Grange have recently returned from their annual outing, which took place at Druce Lake, ten miles west of Waukegan. On the last day of camp an athletic field meet was held, in which trophy cups were won by Horton Conrad in the first class, Emerson Stanley in the second, and Harry Leonard in the third. The boys were in charge of the choirmaster, William Ripley Dorr. The choir is preparing for a season of great activity and has already several tentative dates for out-of-town concerts.

Cavalleria Rusticana

The performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana" on Tuesday evening was a notably fine one and was seen by a large audience.

Gennaro Papi was in charge and he held all the involved forces to absolute unity of purpose and artistry of result, the understanding existing between himself and the stage being at all times perfect.

The Orchestra also did fine work, but repeated hearings of the Mascagni score show, unmistakably, that it is not one of the finest ever written and there are many rough moments as well as some in which the paucity of ideas and lack of finish are notable.

A week ago the writer sat directly back of the orchestra for a "Boheme" performance, and again on Tuesday for "Cavalleria," and at this close range the difference in finesse in favor of the Puccini score was pronounced.

Alice Gentle sang the part of Santuzza in the well-worn opera, and she made of it a glowing vocal delight.

As to her playing of the part, although there are in memory many vivid pictures of others who have delineated for us the Sicilian girl, there is none which is more brilliant than that presented by Miss Gentle, and very few indeed which can approach it for effectiveness.

Morgan Kingston, also in wonderfully good voice, played Turiddu opposite this flaming Santuzza with an equal measure of dramatic fire and careful finish, and the result was a series of dramatic moments never before surpassed on the Ravinia stage.

One might think the Turiddu of Mr. Kingston too savage for the comfort of his vis-a-vis, but Miss Gentle played up to it absolutely, and together they made the quarreling duets full of power, as well as of sordid passion.

The cast was advertised as "All-Star," and it certainly was of the "star" description, in so far as Miss Gentle and Mr. Kingston were concerned, and to these two must be added Millo Picco, who, as Alfio, was a picturesque figure, showed splendid vocal art in his entrance song and wonderfully passionate acting in the scene with Turridu, as well as in the earlier one with Santuzza, where she tells him of the perfidy of Lola.

This part was played by Frances Ingram, who looked the part very well and sang it with considerable effect, except for the off-stage song, which was decidedly off pitch.

The Mama Lucia was a miscast. The score lies too low for Miss Falco, and it is difficult for so young a girl to play this part, and especially so unless she has a good make-up. Miss Falco, in this respect on last Tuesday, was very unfortunate.

C. E. W.

"Carmen"

On Saturday night a repetition of Bizet's masterpiece met with an unusually large audience and greater success than on the night of the first performance. The singers seemed to be in a splendid mood without exception and the audience duly responsive. Alice Gentle in the title role proved a marvel from the histrionic standpoint and was vocally dramatic. Her splendid routine understanding of a large repertoire of roles stamps her among the finest in the profession, though "Carmen" is perhaps not her best role now. At any rate she certainly etched clearly in her performance all the brutality and passion in the character of the gypsy girl.

Riccardo Martin gave a good account of himself as Don Jose and sang his aria with great verve.

Picco and Rothier made distinct impressions, as did also Daddi and D'Angelo in smaller parts.

The gem of the whole opera, however, was Miss Mason's singing of the Micaela aria, which was beautiful in dramatic fervor and in tonal production. Her voice is crystal in quality and unspoiled by wear.

The chorus did not show as good drill as usual, but the orchestra played well and Mr. Hageman conducted with his usual sincerity and artistry.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

"The Jewels of the Madonna" and "Secret of Suzanne"

A beautiful and very successful double bill was that of Sunday night, when Florence Easton made a splendid success in "The Secret of Suzanne" and "The Jewels," playing the widely differing parts of Suzanne and Malliella with equal charm and facility.

In "Secret" Millo Picco was superb as Count Gil, and in "The Jewels" Thomas Chalmers did credit to himself as Rafaelo.

Morgan Kingston was a splendid dramatic figure as Gennaro and sang the beautiful score with telling effect.

The two operas were put on in excellent shape, and the chorus and orchestra did fine work under the baton of Gennaro Papi.

Other Operas

On Tuesday evening "Thais" was repeated and on Wednesday "The Love of Three Kings."

Thursday brought "Pagliacci" again, and tomorrow (Saturday) evening "The Love of Three Kings" will again be heard, with the first performance of "Manon" set for Sunday evening.

ALICE STITZEL GIVES PROGRAM AT ELLEN KINSMAN MANN STUDIO

Monday evening of this week Miss Alice Stitzel, soprano, gave a delightful recital at the studio of Mrs. Mann, in Fine Arts Building. Beulah Taylor Porter played excellent piano accompaniments. Miss Stitzel is a credit to her teacher in the quality of work displayed on this occasion. She not only has real voice but personality and a fine manner toward her audience. I enjoyed her spirited singing in every respect. Miss Stitzel has a gift in quality of voice above the average, her singing of lyric songs is charming, while in numbers that call for power she gives it without reserve and with ease. There was style and finish in her singing and she should be heard from in the concerts and oratorios this season. The program was as given below:

Voi Che Sapete	Mozart
O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me	Handel
When Celia Sings	Moir
Aria from Queen of Sheba	Gounod
My Garden	Mallinson

WILLIAM PHILLIPS

William Phillips, baritone, who has located in Chicago, is the possessor of a glorious voice, a commanding personality and some decidedly enthusiastic press comment.

He has already found great favor with the members of the First Presbyterian Church, to which choir he received a recent appointment. He filled several oratorio engagements in the vicinity last Spring and has return dates for next season.

He takes the stage in engaging fashion and is particularly discriminating in his program-making. Much interest is already expressed in his early Fall recital.

He is under exclusive contract with Louise Quealy, who is planning a busy season for him.

CAVE THOMPSON

FAMOUS BLIND PIANIST

"Cave Thompson, though blind, sees into the mysticism of tonal lore further and truer than many a seeing pianist, and plays with a comfortable assurance of technical command and interpretative conception that made his entire program musically effective."

Thus the Pantagraph of Bloomington commented recently, after a recital by Cave Thompson of Chicago.

And to dispose, once for all, of the question of blindness which with this pianist is a condition, but not a handicap, we quote again, this time from a paragrapher who knows Mr. Thompson intimately and who writes as follows:

"Although there are many instances on record which are chronicles of the success of blind musicians, there are few, indeed, among the blind who have had the temerity to push their study to the extent of becoming concert pianists. At present Mr. Thompson is the only blind pianist in this country who, by merit of thorough musicianship, is entitled to be called a concert pianist. He enjoys concertizing and finds no difficulty in traveling alone."

And this writer, who signs himself E. L. B., goes deeper into the Thompson characteristics and assets when he continues as follows:

"Cave Thompson has no divided interests. To him music is the factor that makes life worth living, and therefore it is not surprising to find in his playing the vital quality of spirituality which must be felt and not acquired."

A mass of material at hand is most interesting, and it could be amplified into a book about Mr. Thompson as readily as into an interesting magazine article.

The temptation to analyze some of this and to quote certain paragraphs is too strong to be resisted.

Under the caption of "A Beacon Light to Others," a writer in the Signal, of Chaffee, Mo., had this to say of Cave Thompson:

"To gaze upon the face and demeanor of an individual of Mr. Thompson's caliber is to perceive without hesitation a striking figure in whom a lofty sense of culture, a never-tiring search for ideals, a well-developed intellect and, withal, an air of refined humor and good, practical business tact which show him to be a live wire in up-to-date life. To such a personality the world stands ready to throw open her doors and bid a warm welcome; for such stamina, self-reliance and apparent utter abandonment of one of the greatest of human afflictions acts as a drastic example from a beacon light to the sluggard and the aimless. At the instrument his marvelous fingers confirm to the intelligent ear what the studious eye had already drained to the full."

But this thought about Mr. Thompson, especially in reference to his personality, is backed up by many other newspaper items, in which various other attainments of his are commented upon in language which proves very conclusively that his work has left its vivid impression on many minds and many writers.

For instance, the Warsaw (Ind.) Union, in speaking of his technic, says that he has "fingers of seeming steel, tipped with delicate velvet"; the Chicago Record-Herald characterizes his interpretations as "broad, heroic and masterly"; the Daily American (Chicago) says that his playing is full of "poetic meaning," and the Chicago Evening Post says of his work that it shows "eminent ability."

On another date the Record-Herald spoke of the fact that his Chopin group showed "mobility of style," and the News of Antioch (Ill.) elaborated on the fact of his superb technic and close sympathy with the selections rendered.

And so, through many pages of collected eulogy, the Thompson achievements and artistry are commented upon.

. . . . . .

And to all this the present writer wishes to add his personal word.

He has been closely associated with Mr. Thompson for some years, and has watched his work with pleasure and admiration. His capability as a business man and his keen insight into all matters, musical and otherwise, has been, always, a source of astonishment and of admiration.

His teaching of piano has been noted to be extremely successful and effective, and his concert playing is always anticipated as a most important event of the season.

The items already printed in this article in reference to Mr. Thompson are so all-embracing that it is difficult to add more, but it must be said, nevertheless, that he has been found clear as to technic, definite in musicianship and readings, and always imbued with poetic feeling and a marvelous degree of ability to paint pictures in tone.

. . . . . .

The coming season is to be, unquestionably, a fine one for the musical profession, and in this revival of musical interest Mr. Thompson (who already is being rapidly booked) will decidedly fill a conspicuous place.

He is at present recuperating at his country home at Bass Lake, Mich., where he spends hours each day with his piano, and his return to Chicago in the fall will find him keenly alive to the coming musical season and in excellent shape for his concert engagements, and for his teaching, which, as has been the case for the past eighteen years, will be in Kimball Hall.

MARIE SIDENIUS ZENDT HAS SONG DEDICATED TO HER BY THE POPULAR COMPOSER, JOHN PRINDLE SCOTT

In a letter recently Mr. Scott says: "I wrote a song for you last spring and Harold Flammer has just published it—a sacred one—'There Is a Land of Pure Delight,' which has your name across the top. I hope you may like it and that I may hear you sing it in the fall."

Mme. Zendt is singing some interesting songs at the Lockport Festival September 8.

OSCAR SAENGER VISITS RAVINIA PARK

While in Chicago Mr. Saenger was an interested visitor at a performanec of "Elisir d'Amour" at Ravinia Park. This opera was splendidly sung with Mabel Garrison and Orville Harrold in the leading roles. It will be remembered that both these sterling artists were launched upon their operatic careers by this famous master.

CLASS WORK OF MME. MARIE YUNG

MME. MARIE YUNG, DIRECTOR OF THE EUROPEAN BALLET SCHOOL

A very beautifully illustrated booklet has just been issued by the European Ballet School, and from this we quote the following very interesting data about Mme. Marie Yung, the director:

Mme. Marie Yung

Mme. Marie Yung, director of the well-known European Ballet School, Chicago, one of the largest schools of dancing in America, has proved that this country can produce dancing artists on a par with those of Europe.

Mme. Yung's latest contribution to the field of professional dancing is Sylvia Tell, a young American girl but sixteen years of age, who made her debut with the Chicago Grand Opera as Premiere Danseuse November 11, 1918. She was the first American girl to achieve this distinction. Born in Milwaukee and later coming to Chicago, her entire dancing instruction was received from Mme. Yung.

Among other former pupils of Mme. Yung who now hold prominent positions in the professional world are: Dorothy Dickson, Carl Hyson, Tillie Zick, Ernestine Meyers, Gladys Walton, Muriel DeForrest, Gladys Buckley, Libbie Bartusek, Emily Fitzgerald, Mercedes Hancock, Dorothy Miller and Florence Cummings.

European Ballet School

Before coming to America, Mme. Yung had gained fame in many countries of Europe as Premiere Danseuse. She began her studies in dancing at the age of three with Mme. Nirschi of the Royal Opera, Budapest. With Luugi Mazzantini she studied the Italian style of dancing and with Joseph Godlewsky the Russian.

Hearing of her remarkable achievements, Andreas Dippel, formerly director of the Chicago Opera Association, persuaded her to come to Chicago to train members of the ballet.

Mme. Yung possesses a remarkable ability for teaching the art of toe and ballet dancing which has made her widely known both in Europe and America.

"None of the other tutors seem to possess Mme. Yung's flair for imparting," says a recent writer in the Chicago Tribune.

For eight years Mme. Yung has taught dancing in America. The remarkable achievements of her pupils is the most convincing evidence of her pre-eminent proficiency in her art.

HANS HESS TO GIVE NEW YORK RECITAL

Mr. Hess' dates for the coming season include an appearance with the Rockford Mendelssohn Club October 9; Amateur Musical Club, Peoria, October 17; New York Aeolian Hall, October 22; Chicago, Kimball Hall, date of which will be announced later. Mr. Hess has been extremely busy this summer on his concert repertoire for the coming season. However, he has managed to spend week-ends on long hikes, swimming or motoring.

PAUL MORENZO APPEARS AT BIG BENEFIT PERFORMANCE

Paul Morenzo was one of the soloists at the big benefit performance and lawn festa given under the auspices of the Thursday Hospital After-Care for the needy of Governor Hospital and children crippled by infantile paralysis, at Hollywood, N. J., on July 25.

This was the second time that Mr. Morenzo volunteered his services to this worthy cause. He sang there the first time six years ago, just after his return from Europe, and now the second time shortly after his return to New York from Canada. He was heard in the aria from "Boheme," which aroused great enthusiasm among the large assemblage.

Hadley—Mr. Grant Hadley sang at the Pantheon last week, making his fourth appearance in that theater in the last six months. Mr. Lester Anderson, pupil of Grant Hadley was soloist at St. Paul's M. E. Church Sunday, August 10.

MARIAN CORYELL

Marian Coryell, composer-pianist, is spending most of the summer at Grand Ledge, Mich., writing some new songs, to be used the coming season.

The first to be heard will be "The Watcher," a splendid song for low voice, which was written especially for Dr. Carver Williams, basso, to sing at the American Music Festival at Lockport.

Dr. Williams is also using there two other songs of Marian Coryell, "The Medlar Tree" (MS.) and "Springtime," which has been published by Presser.

He has added these songs to his regular repertoire and will use them throughout the coming season.

Harriet Case, one of the sopranos at this same festival, will add Miss Coryell's song, "Contentment," to her group of numbers. This piece will be off the press in a very few days, and Miss Case will give the first reading from printed copy, although a number of artists have already sung it from manuscript.

Miss Coryell has charge of the music at the Christian Science Society at Grand Ledge, and on one occasion her setting of the Twenty-third Psalm as a duet for soprano and contralto was presented by Mrs. George Coryell and Mrs. Beth Wells with decided success. This was gone over by several leading Chicago church singers and pronounced lovely and singable.

Helen Abbott Byfield used a manuscript song of Miss Coryell's entitled "Goodnight" in a group of five songs by living composers at a concert for the Tuesday Musical Club of Marshalltown, Iowa, June 24. It met with instantaneous success and had to be repeated.

Miss Coryell played her own wedding song and march at the wedding of Major Knight of Waukegan and Roberta Berry of Grand Ledge, in the Episcopal Church, Sunday, June 22. This was Miss Coryell's first public appearance at the pipe organ.

FLORIDA TEACHERS TAKE A BIG STEP FORWARD IN THE "NOTHING FOR NOTHING" CAMPAIGN

That various musical bodies are beginning to think about business interests and of co-operation as a means toward the securing of definite results is shown in the following resolutions, drafted by the Tampa Music Teachers' Association:

(Such action should be taken by the professionals in every town and city and all amateurs driven from the public field.—Editor Music News.)

Music Teachers Adopt Resolutions

We, the undersigned members of the Tampa Music Teachers' Association, realize the time has come in Tampa to put our work on a business, professional basis. We are called upon daily to give our services for entertaining. For years we have responded to various calls for concerts, teas, clubs, weddings, school entertainments, accompanists, etc., gratuitously. Tampa has grown into a city, the demands are large and we have money invested in our business that must pay interest. We feel sure the public will heartily agree and co-operate with us when we resolve from the Fourth of July to charge for all services rendered, excepting the Friday morning musicale meetings, which are for our mutual benefit, improvement and inspiration. We shall be glad to answer calls for our services at any time in Tampa, or elsewhere, also to arrange programs using our members, if possible, or substituting when desired, charging for time consumed in rehearsals.

Assuring you that in serving you professionally we shall be able to serve you best, and at the same time add to the dignity of our profession:

A NEW SCHOOL OF OPERA AND ENSEMBLE

Hugo Riesenfeld and Josiah Zuro announce the organization of a school of opera and ensemble, which will be operated in conjunction with the Rivoli and Rialto theaters in New York, now under the direction of Mr. Riesenfeld.

Mr. Zuro will be the director and will have complete charge of the school, which will be located at the Rivoli Theater, and he will be assisted by a staff of prominent artists. Foremost among them is the well-known stage director, Jacques Coini, formerly of the Manhattan Opera House and Century Theater, where he was responsible for a number of original productions in French and Italian. Mr. Coini will act as stage instructor and teacher of mise en scene.

Joseph Littau, formerly of the Boston Opera Company and now one of the conductors at the Rivoli Theater, and Hans Stiner of the Metropolitan Opera House will coach the pupils in the works of the Italian and French repertory.

Luigi Albertieri will have charge of the ballet classes, and Amedeo Grossi, late of the Costanzi Theater in Rome and San Carlos in Naples, will be the professor of Italian as well as of diction. The faculty will also include a teacher of French. The secretary of the school will be M. M. Hansford, to whom all communications may be addressed at the Rivoli Theater.

"Our purpose of founding a school of opera and ensemble," declares Mr. Riesenfeld, "is to enable young singers to obtain a complete operatic training under the best auspices. A large classroom has been reserved for the use of the pupils at the Rivoli Theater, where the stage will also be at their disposal for rehearsals. Promising pupils will be assured of a public appearance as soloists either at the Rivoli or Rialto theaters, and it is my intention to give scenes from operas with them at the Rivoli."

Mr. Zuro, who will be at the head of the school, is well known in operatic circles in New York as well as in other parts of this country, having held the position of musical director of grand opera as well as of light opera companies. He was engaged by Oscar Hammerstein to train the chorus for the Manhattan Opera House in 1907. The following season he was promoted to the post of conductor and directed the performance of "Hans the Flute Player." For three seasons he was at the head of his own opera company and he was engaged as conductor of the Century Opera Company, sharing the artistic guidance of that organization with Jacques Coini. He spent two years in California directing the San Francisco Opera Company and festivals in conjunction with Alfred Hertz. He also conducted the open-air performance of "Aida" which was given in San Francisco with Gadski, Zinovieff, Whitehill and Claussen. On his return to the East Mr. Zuro was engaged by the Aeolian Company to establish the phonograph department, and last spring he conducted a season of grand opera in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

Messrs. Riesenfeld and Zuro have ambitious plans for their school of opera, which will be opened late in September.

SOMETHING NEW IN GRAND OPERA

Rip Van Winkle a New Precedent in Opera Making

Reginald de Koven and Percy MacKaye, truly representative of all that is best in American art, both musically and dramatically, are fast completing their work on "Rip Van Winkle," the new folk opera in three acts, which will be produced this autumn by the Chicago Opera Association.

In his preface to the text Percy MacKaye writes: "For the first time an American dramatist and an American composer have been directly commissioned by producers of opera to write and compose work for production on the operatic stage.

"Early in the present year Mr. Cleofonte Campanini of the Chicago Opera Association made definite arrangements with Mr. Reginald de Koven and myself in regard to 'Rip Van Winkle' and its production in Chicago, New York and elsewhere during the season of 1919-20. During the next few months I wrote the text of the opera, for which Mr. de Koven had completed composing the music by the first of July. The choice and treatment of subject were my own, and entire freedom of course was given for the execution of the text and music."

UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF MUSIC, ANN ARBOR, MICH.

One of the finest catalogs of the year is that of the University School of Music at Ann Arbor, Mich., from which we copy the following:

Foreword

The University School of Music is located in the City of Ann Arbor, Mich., the seat of the University of Michigan, and enjoys many cultural advantages by reason of this association. It is conducted by the University Musical Society of the University of Michigan, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, which has for its object "the advancement of musical culture in the University of Michigan and the city of Ann Arbor." Its board of directors includes the president and the secretary of the university, the dean of the medical school, several prominent faculty men, graduates of the university, and other residents whose standing is such as to give absolute confidence in its standards, and which guarantees the efficiency of its administration. The university professor of music is the musical director of the school.

Thus the University School of Music, while not a department of the University of Michigan in a technical sense, is intimately connected with it, and enjoys a more sympathetic interrelation than is frequently the case in institutions in which there exists a department of music necessarily subordinate to considerations outside the realm of music. A further indication of this intimate relation is the fact that by unanimous vote of the faculty of the literary department, students of that department, who are able to do practical work in music of sufficiently advanced nature, are permitted to elect courses in the University School of Music and are given regular credit in the University. Similar arrangements have been made with the Ann Arbor High School. This co-ordination is of special interest to those students who wish to supplement their literary education by work in practical music.

New Main Building

Owing to the greatly increased attendance and the development of activities in several directions, the main building was conspicuously inadequate for the successful prosecution of the work of the school. This in spite of the added facilities afforded by the commodious annex and rooms in the Hill Auditorium. Consequently the board of directors, realizing the importance of providing suitable facilities for study, practice, and rehearsals, as well as for social activities, in spite of the perilous "war times" with which the country was confronted, arranged for the complete remodeling of the main building, and the work was finished in October, 1917. The alterations include the addition of twenty teaching and practice studios, commodious waiting rooms for both men and women students, convenient office facilities, and such a general rearrangement of rooms as will make possible greater comfort and added efficiency.

Faculty

The heads of departments are as follows:

Piano—Albert Lockwood.
Voice—William Wheeler.
Violin—Samuel Lockwood.
Violoncello—Lee N. Parker.
Organ—Earl V. Moore.
Theory—Earl V. Moore.

CHICAGO OPERA ASSOCIATION

Pavley and Oukrainsky, the gifted premiere danseurs of the Chicago Opera Company, announce that they will have as assisting artists, next winter, Mlles. Ludmila and Ledova, premiere classical dancers; Mlles. Arnold and Nemeroff, premiere character dancers, and Mlles. Pfeil and Grennell.

The Chicago Opera Association announces that it has completed arrangements with John Alden Carpenter for the production of his ballet, "The Birthday of the Infanta."

Contracts have been signed with Robert Edmond Jones for the scenery, costumes and properties, and Adolf Bolm, whose connection with the Russian ballet will be remembered.

Mr. Bolm will stage the ballet and will probably appear in it personally.

Yvonne Gall, the popular French soprano of the Chicago Opera Association, is being hailed throughout her native country as "France's greatest living lyric soprano." Since her return from America, she has been literally swamped with offers from the various French directors, besides an offer to sing at Covent Garden during the present season, and another to come at once to South America. Mlle. Gall, however, has steadfastly refused almost all engagements, giving as her reason that the study of many new roles assigned to her by Maestro Campanini and the need of rest before returning to Chicago preclude her accepting them.

Mlle. Gall, who is nearly as widely known in France as a feminist as she is a singer, recently startled her friends by announcing that should the French Parliament grant to women the right to vote, she would become a candidate for the office of municipal counselor in Paris.

Two New York Critics Write of Namara

Following is some comment on the singing of Marguerite Namara of the Chicago Opera Company:

Lyric Soprano Gives Successful Demonstration of Her Art at Recital in Aeolian Hall

The title "lyric soprano" may mean little or nothing or much. In the case of Mme. Marguerite Namara, who gave a recital yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall, it means a great deal. Her dramatic as well as her musical sense is fully developed, and each is the complement of the other. She has cultivation in a high degree and a warmth of tone which is eminently satisfying, the general effect of her singing being that of balance and poise. To these qualities is added on occasion a nice sense of humor. From the antiquated bravura of Durante's "Danza, Danza!" to the more conventional strains of Bellini's "Ah! Non Credea" was an easy transition, and in the latter there was good dramatic sense and coloratura.

By far the most interesting number, musically, was the air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." This is not the vague and mystical Debussy of "Pelleas," the song being lyrical and passionate to a rare degree, and it gave opportunity for a perfect example of Mme. Namara's art.—New York Herald.

Moreover, the fact that she is not a stranger makes it possible to record the fact that her singing marked an improvement over that of other days, and it is a pleasure to say that. Her list of songs was varied in manner and merit of content and the numbers which put her powers most severely to the test were those with which, in obedience to a formula which might wisely be abandoned, she began her recital. These were "Caro mio ben," attributed to Giordano; Durante's "Danza, Danza Fanciulla!" and "Ah! Non Credea," from "La Somnambula."

Excellent in enunciation was the singer in all her songs, though possibly a little too French (if it be French to indulge in much nasal twang), and excellent, with occasional qualification, was the clarity of her tonal emission, which made her softest pianissimi audible in all parts of the room. She gave an agreeable entertainment.—New York Tribune.

When Minnette Warren Played in New York

The press comment is as follows:

Miss Warren opened the evening with a very intelligent reading of Grieg's Ballade in G minor, following which she was splendidly received. . . . In the Chopin she was at ease, disclosing an easy technic and fine keyboard sense, and after this group was showered with beautiful bouquets and much applauded. . . . Much interest centered around Miss Warren's own works, which found place in the last two groups, and reflected the versatility of this gifted young musician. It is evident that Miss Warren was not only a pianist of ample technic, but a musician of parts with much genuine talent for composition.—Musical Courier.

At Aeolian Hall last evening a large audience generously applauded the notable recital of Minnette Warren, a young pianist and composer of exceedingly fine accomplishment. . . . She gave status to the judiciously selected program by beginning with the Grieg Ballale, adding at intervals most artistically numbers by Chopin, MacDowell, Zeckwer, Scott and several admirable compositions of her own.—Morning Telegraph.

Following her recital at Aeolian Hall on October 11, Minnette Warren, pianist, gave a recital before the Daughters of the Empire State at the Waldorf-Astoria on Thursday, October 17. . . . In her Chopin group Miss Warren displayed fine technical skill and much beauty of tone and was heartily applauded. . . . Scored in her appearance in the ballroom of the Hotel Knickerbocker before the convention of the Catholic "Big Sisters" . . . and a spirited reading of the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire."—Musical America.

Miss Warren gave an unusual recital last night in Aeolian Hall. . . . Chopin group particularly was played with youthful and graceful appreciation. . . . Her own compositions were ambitious and showed evidence of a phenomenal talent.—New York World.

With confidence and assurance and depth of tone and feeling . . . great strength and mature conception.—New York Sun.

The Musical Observer takes particular pleasure in commenting upon the continued success of Minnette Warren, who, while still in her teens, has gained a most enviable reputation in the west, where she has been heard in public since her ninth year. . . . Her program was a most ambitious one as far as classics are concerned, and besides several of her own compositions, contained a number of new works by representative American composers. In this way she presented herself in the threefold capacity of player, composer and promoter of American piano solo works. . . . Her New York appearance has aroused considerable interest.—Musical Observer.

Salvatore de Stefano

The New York press comments on the work of the harp virtuoso:

Salvatore de Stefano proved himself to be a rare artist with a wealth of technic at his command. His playing was a joy and fully demonstrated the possibilities of the modern harp.—New York Tribune.

Salvatore de Stefano acquitted himself with honor and demonstrated his mastery of the harp.—New York Press.

The most completely satisfying artist was Salvatore de Stefano, who played with delicacy and life.—New York Tribune.

Salvatore de Stefano is deservedly recognized among the leading harpists of the day.—New York American.

Salvatore de Stefano, the harpist, possesses a fine technic.—New York Sun.

Rudolph Reuter

From among the many press comments of Mr. Reuter arriving at this office we reprint the following:

Mr. Reuter is a pianist of unusual ability, of clear, accurate and brilliant technic. His Brahms numbers were authoritatively given and his almost reckless pace in the Paderewski Caprice called for tremendous applause.—Aurora, Ill., Beacon-News.

The Mendelssohn number alone proved Mr. Reuter to be one of the most gifted virtuosos.—Chicago Daily News.

The soloist in yesterday's concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Rudolph Reuter, won the admiration of the audience by his wonderful playing of the Rubinstein Concerto. His tone is colorful and especially in the middle movement showed to advantage. His playing of the finale was full of brilliance and dash and the speed amazing in its clarity.—Centralia, Ill., Sentinel.

In the first movement of the concerto (Beethoven) he was a great pianist.—Chicago Examiner.

Mr. Reuter delighted a large audience. He opened his program with a stirring rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner." New depths of poetic beauty were sounded in the numbers he presented. Virile strength, imagination and intensity are the predominating factors of his art.—Grand Rapids, Mich., News.

The recital given by Rudolph Reuter was one of the most important musical events of the season. He is a pianist of wonderful ability and wide execution. The technic of the artist and his talent and feeling held his listeners enthralled.—Springfield, Ill., State Journal.

Three Critics Praise Christine Langenhan

Mme. Christine Langenhan, soprano, who created a sensation in New York and Boston on her debut in this country last season, was the chief soloist of the evening and her singing was a real delight to her hearers.

Mme. Langenhan's voice is as strong and clear as it is sweet. She has some lovely high pianissimo and her singing is full of temperament and feeling.—Syracuse Herald.

Christine Langenhan, dramatic soprano, made a wonderful impression with her big and brilliant voice. Her songs proved very popular and she responded with many extra selections, among which were the following: Aria from "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Annie Laurie," "Birth of Morn" and "One in One." Madame Langenhan's singing of the Mascagni aria showed the breadth and power of her voice to such advantage that one wished for more operatic excerpts.—Providence Journal.

The artist rendered a diversified program of musical numbers that was very meritorious. Madame Langenhan uses her powerful voice in splendid fashion and couples this with dynamics and shading that make her tones a pleasing asset.—Providence Evening Tribune.

Christine Langenhan sang "Messiah." She has a powerful voice with considerable range and sings with nice appreciation and feeling.—Baltimore Evening Sun.

The Beethoven Trio

The Chicago Herald-Examiner (Henriette Weber) said this of the recent concert of the Beethoven Trio:

The Beethoven Trio, consisting of three of Chicago's real musicians, M. Jennette Loudon, piano; Ralph Michaelis, violin, and Theodore Du Moulin, cello, was heard in a good program of chamber music last evening.

The trio has been in existence some years under this name, with Miss Loudon, the originator, always staying with it. The other two instruments have changed masters, however, and the present personnel, after a number of concerts out of town, has established a mutual musical understanding that makes a Chicago appearance timely.

They played Beethoven with fine respect for the balance of parts and deft and finished phrasing. Interesting variations of Rachmaninoff struck the modern note acutely and constituted the vehicle for playing of considerable brilliance. The artists scored a real success.

Augusta Cottlow in New York

When Augusta Cottlow, the American pianist, appeared in New York recently the New York Evening Sun commented as follows:

The piano recital given by Augusta Cottlow last night at Aeolian Hall was a sound and creditable performance, sufficient in itself, and standing safely on the legs of its own achievement. . . . She has fine gifts of interpretation, a splendid technic, power to call up the hosts of sound at one moment and to dismiss them lightly the next. Her Bach was that Toccata in C major . . . its rendition looms tremendous to the pianist. Miss Cottlow last night did not fail to vanquish its technical difficulties, nor did she miss any of the melodious beauty of the slower passages. The feminine nuances and the lingering but completely restrained sentiment of Chopin seem to come instinctively from the feminine finger tips. On the program also were the Norse Sonata, in which MacDowell's spacious saga-singing harmonies received their due strong colorings; Busoni's Indian Sketch Book, and at the end Liszt's Mephisto Waltz, whose chromatic brilliancies and the insist-

Times have indeed changed when a woman pianist can face its satanic spells and live unscathed to dash it off at the end of a recital.

May Peterson in the South

On the occasion of Miss Peterson's recent appearance at Jacksonville, Fla., the Times-Union of that city commented as follows:

Choosing for the second evening of the Spring Music Festival a singer of international fame, Madame May Peterson of the Metropolitan Grand Opera was surely a wise selection, even though many Jacksonville people, for one cause or another, neglected to be at the Duval Theater last night. The oversight on the part of the absentees will be their loss, and they will understand today, from those who sat under the spell of Madame Peterson's art last night, that the opportunity was unusual, the occasion delightful in every way. For the evening, closing the festival, Madame Peterson gave a program that touched upon every emotion, reached the heights of fantasy, and did not fail to come gracefully to gather the daisies and buttercups that grow by the wayside in wonderful Melody Land. It was a remarkable occasion for those who attended the recital at the Duval; an evening full of beautiful music and from the first clear, bell-like note in the introductory number, an evening of rare satisfaction.

May Peterson, making her first appearance in Jacksonville, was at once at home; a charming woman of engaging personality and possessed of that friendliness that dismisses the thought of the artist; substituting the idea of an especially talented guest, contributing from her wealth of music to the pleasure of other guests. Arrayed in a gown of blue and silver, her golden hair and blue eyes, her fascinating smile and her sometimes serious and ofttimes merry moods, this queen of song led hither and thither the assemblage on the wings of music, and it seemed that each added number brought her more appreciation, gave fuller enjoyment. There were a few changes from the printed program, and some of the numbers, perhaps, were more enjoyed because of Madame Peterson's brief synopsis, but all of the promised feast was given, and when insistent in its demands the audience was given more in some very dainty encores.

Madame Peterson opened her program with a group of old songs, "Nina," Mozart's "Warning," "Amarili" (Caccini), and the "Allelujah" (Mozart). It was all exquisite and lovely and the introduction thus given and received assured the enjoyment of the evening. After this group the famous aria, "Depois le Jour," from "Louise" (Charpentier), was given and this easily demonstrated the full range and great beauty of Madame Peterson's voice. The aria makes great demands upon the singer and every technical difficulty was surmounted with ease and each succeeding period more and more beautiful and effective. It was a triumph that could only have been attained by an artist gifted with a glorious voice. Coloratura singers are often pale in tone and mere echoes in the higher register, but here was the fullest open tone in the heights, with perfect control and reserve beyond the heaviest requirement of the score.

From this operatic number Madame Peterson turned to various features of musical composition, introducing French, Russian and English songs, all of merit and each finding a ready response in the hearts of the audience. The Gavotte, from "Manon" (Massenet) was a favorite with many, and the "Three Cavaliers," an old Russian folk song, was heartily applauded. Others included the "Butterflies" (Fourdrain), "Snowflakes" (Mallison), and many others. The negro melody was naturally well received, not so much on account of its musical value as for its whimsical verity, and the substitution, which brought forward "Love Is the Wind," was appreciated and welcomed. Through all of the program Madame Peterson frequently talked a bit of the songs she would sing, and this completed the dismissal of the formality. Some bouquets of beautiful roses were sent up to the singer and acknowledged gracefully in song, and Stuart Ross, who, throughout the evening, painted a sympathetic, realistic background for the tone picture on the grand piano, also came in for a share of appreciation in several numbers. Madame Peterson acknowledged the splendid support given, and more than once indicated her desire to share with him the commendation accorded the songs.

Eleanor Spencer in Detroit

On the occasion of her appearance with the orchestra in Detroit the press commented as follows:

Eleanor Spencer, the accomplished young American artist of the piano, pleased a sympathetic and informed audience at Aeolian Hall with her excellent projection of a diversified and seriously considered program, which displayed both the versatility and the exceptionally good technic of the artist.—Morning Telegraph.

She still holds her vigor of style, her feeling for sharp differentiation of rhythm, but she has added to her equipment an ability to disclose some of the more delicate possibilities of the instrument.—Evening Journal.

"Dead" Opera

Grand opera, says Maestro Campanini of the Chicago company, has no future, and its days are numbered. The packed houses that still greet first-class performances of "Lucia," "Il Trovatore" and "Rigoletto," however, indicate that if grand opera has no future it has a very healthy past; and if its days are numbered there are a lot of music lovers clamoring for the back numbers.—Music and Musicians.

ORCHESTRA HALL

At Orchestra Hall this week the big picture is "A Society Exile," in which Elsie Ferguson finds opportunity to exploit those qualities which have made her so great a favorite in "The Silent Drama."

The action of this piece involves the use of Massenet's "Elegie" and "Oh, Dry Those Tears," and the deft way in which the music of these is synchronized with the moving picture reflects a new and pronounced credit upon Miss Mildred Fitzpatrick, the organist.

There is other good music, including songs by Princess Wa-Su-La, and the entire bill is a very interesting one.

Next week the picture will be "Nobody Home" (Dorothy Gish) and the special soloists will be Alvina and Gladys Peterson, soprano and alto.

ATMOSPHERE IN THE CONCERT HALL

By SASCHA VOTICHENKO

The work of an artist is seldom finished with the last stroke of his brush. He first chooses a suitable frame and then supervises the hanging of his picture, realizing that the effect of a good painting may be spoiled if improperly placed. And what background is to a picture atmosphere is to the singer or musician in the studio, theater or concert hall.

By atmosphere in the theater I mean that particular environment which exerts an unconscious mental influence on an audience. We all know that a house without the atmosphere of home is a very dismal affair—and just as the dwelling place expresses the individuality of the home-maker the concert hall should suggest with subtlety and charm the personality of a performer, for atmosphere is as essential to an artistic performance on the concert stage as effective settings and good costuming are to the success of a dramatic or musical production.

Owing to the prevailing restrictions which exist in our theaters at the present time it is difficult for an artist to create an atmosphere of friendliness and charm. But much may be accomplished with a little foresight and ingenuity. Consider your own personality, your program and the particular instrument upon which you play. In this way many original methods of presentation may occur to you. I believe that as yet too little has been said and done in this direction. The artist, who is the most sensitive of all human beings, often suffers cruelly from the harsh lights and the air of rigid conventionality, while the audience frequently finds it difficult to follow a long and technical program in the restrained and uninviting atmosphere which usually prevails in concert halls.

The largest gathering of the season was present at the Wednesday evening concert of August 6 in Hill Auditorium to hear James Hamilton, tenor, of the faculty of the University School of Music, and Mrs. Maud Okkelberg, pianist, formerly of the same institution. The audience was not merely large in numbers, it was large in its appreciation, in its enthusiasm, and in its good judgment; for one would have to search the annals of music here to find a program that was so well chosen and so faultlessly presented, and at the same time so rightfully appreciated by the unusual gathering.

Mr. Hamilton demonstrated from the very first that he is a big singer; bigger than his most intimate friends suspected. He has the power, the accuracy, the temperament, the stage presence, and above all the nervous control both of himself and of the audience that makes for big things. He is also fortunate in being gifted with infinite variety in his presentations; there is never a suggestion of monotony. His voice displays the freshness of youth and the culture of the veteran; in its piano passages it is soft and velvety, but fluent and far-reaching; it goes to the most remote nook in the great hall without a suggestion of fading. In its fortissimo passages it is simply tremendous. It would be hard to imagine anything more beautifully done than the first Handel number, or the Spirito Gentil, where he displayed his great range, taking with such absolute ease and precision the top C, that the crowd was almost brought to its feet; his laugh in Vesti la Giubba, which he sang as an encore to the Spirito Gentil, is as sardonic as that of Satan. The fervor and intensity with which he sang the "Negro Spirituals" can be appreciated only by those who know the southern negro's deep religious cast of mind. One wonders why a man who can sing as Mr. Hamilton sings will devote so much more time to teaching than to the exposition of his art.

Mrs. Okkelberg's playing, always distinctive, was at its best. Her tone is of a fine singing quality without sign of stiffness or anxiety. Her technic is ample and her interpretative gift is of unusual order. The very hearty reception accorded her showed in what esteem she is held by the music lovers of Ann Arbor.

Piano accompaniments for Mr. Hamilton were admirably played by Burton Garthinghouse, an artist student of the School of Music.

MANY FRENCH MUSICAL ARTISTS TO COME HERE FOR NEXT SEASON

The French American Association for Musical Art, which has, under the auspices of the French High Commission and a committee of well-known American citizens, brought many of the best-known French artists and organizations to this country, including the noted orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire, under the baton of Andre Messager, is preparing for a still more active season next year, according to Richard G. Herndon, the general manager, who, with Frank Taylor Kintzing, his associate, is now mapping out the routes of more than a score of French artists.

Mr. Herndon has just returned from Paris, where he journeyed to complete these plans. The most important will be the engagement of the entire company from Le Gaiete, with more than sixty members and an orchestra of thirty. This is a government theater, presenting opera comique.

"The tour of this company is made possible through the efforts of this association and Henri Casadesus, the founder of the Society of Ancient Instruments, which has been frequently heard in American concert halls, and which will have a tour of three months during the season, M. Casadesus having been granted leave of absence for this period from his new duties as the director of Le Gaiete, a post to which he has just been nominated," Mr. Herndon said in the new offices of the French American Association for Musical Art in the Century Theater on Central Park West. "M. Casadesus and his musical organization will commence their tour very early in the season, and during this time the plans for the visit of the opera company from Le Gaiete will be completed. The arrangements contemplate a season of eight weeks in New York at one of the best known play houses, to be followed by an engagement in New Orleans at the French Theater for four weeks. Thereafter the company will play limited engagements in the important cities of the United States and Canada."

Among the artists who will make tours under official auspices this season are several who have already won signal distinction in their previous American appearances, notably Magdaleine Brard, the remarkable young pianiste, a Paris Conservatoire grand prize winner in piano under Alfred Cortot, the brilliant artist and pedagogue of this institution. Mlle. Brard will have at least fifty concert appearances. Raoul Laparra, the composer and pianist, will appear with the eastern orchestras as soloist, and Mme. Raymonde Delanois, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will also appear as soloist at the conclusion of her opera engagement. Thereafter Mme. Delanois will appear jointly with M. Laparra in recitals, presenting the latter's brilliant composition, "A Musical Journey Through Spain," which was one of the concluding offerings in Boston this season, and which has been accorded the highest praise from critics.

"Two new musical artists whom the French are sending over this year are Micheline Kahn, harpist, and Yvonne Astruc, violinist, who are to appear in joint recitals. They are among the new musical sensations of Paris and are relied upon to create a like impression in this country," Mr. Herndon continued. "And then we expect visits from Camille Chevillard, composer and conductor of Lamoureux Orchestra; Gabriel Pierne, composer and conductor of the celebrated Colonne Orchestra, and Alphonse Catherine, who appeared here last season as guest conductor with several of our noted symphony orchestras. He has been forming musical units for the soldiers under direction of the French government. Although these and other artists are coming here from France, and there is a strong desire on the part of most of the French artists to visit the United States, they are arranging for one of the most active seasons in the history of music in France. Many of the plans have been delayed because so many of the younger artists are still in the army, and it will be several weeks before they are demobilized."

Mr. Herndon also completed arrangements for the opening of the Theater Parisien in New York next season. This intimate theater, with a repertoire embracing short plays, operetta and general French light music and comedy, will play for twenty weeks at what is now known as the Belmont Theater, but which hereafter is to be the Theatre Parisien.

John McCormack sings at Hammerstein's Funeral

An impressive funeral for the deceased impresario was the people's tribute. Those who admired him, and among them his opponents, too, attended the ceremony at the temple Emanu-El.

Oscar Hammerstein used to like "The Mystery of Life" and "The Lost Chord," and both these favorites were sung by John McCormack at his funeral. Those who listened to his emotional singing were moved to tears. Floral tributes were sent by every prominent theatrical organization, also flowers and wreaths from the musical clubs. After the ceremony the burial took place at Woodlawn Cemetery. His wife, son and the two married daughters were the chief figures in this most impressive funeral.

Richard Epstein Dies

On August 2 the musical circles of New York registered the loss of another musician. Richard Epstein, a brilliant accompanist, teacher of voice and a pianist of unusual strength, expired at his residence, after an illness of several months. He was only fifty years of age, and his was distinctly a premature death. Last season he appeared with the Elshuco Trio, consisting of Samuel Gardner, violinist; William Wileke, cellist, and himself as pianist. He often accompanied the best vocalists and instrumentalists, either at Carnegie or Aeolian Halls. Of late he devoted his energies and talents to teaching. He had been a resident of New York only since 1914, his native city being Vienna.

Music at the Rialto

They say that Carnegie or Aeolian Halls carry to one the genuine musical atmosphere because symphonies, recitalists and the whole chain of musical entertainments are there to be heard. But atmosphere can be found in any place where music carries its real message, even in the movie house. The drum, the piano and the lively violin are only phantoms of the past, even in the movie houses. The Rialto Symphony Orchestra played, for the week ending August 10, the overture to "Freischutz," by Carl Maria von Weber, and the manner in which Mr. Riesenfeld conducted his body of musicians compelled admiration. Messrs. Stransky and Walter Damrosch should take notice. The wonderful music of the genial Weber sounded superbly, and it was inspiriting even to lovers of movies only. Martin Brefel sang agreeably "Oh, Paradise!" from "L'Africaine" (Meyerbeer), and Sascha Fiedelman played a solo on the violin.

The organist played Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" at the Rivoli.. I should have preferred a more intelligent execution of "La Tosca." The orchestra is finely organized, but its conductor, Erno Rapee, is responsible for its shortcomings.

"Aida" at the Stadium—Olga Carrara and Ernest Davis

The weather man is not a dependable factor. Our capricious Summer of 1919 may be termed as being freakish. Open-air performances have so far been risky to the entrepeneurs as well as to others concerned in such events. A few minutes after "Aida" began, the abominable rain threw us into confusion. The large audience became hordes searching for dry shelter. The day began with clouds. It was risky to begin the performance in the open Stadium. The management, when the rain began pouring its tumultuous waters, was also in a panic. The confusion could have been avoided if the directors had opened the doors ready to admit the crowds into the gymnasium of the City College. Finally we all resumed our seats. One may suspect that even the soloists must have been affected by the atmosphere, for co-ordination was absent during the performance. Taken as a whole, "Aida" was not less than a mess; individually speaking, it procured some genuine pleasure. It would be unnecessary to dwell on each interpreter.

Earle Tuckerman, as Amonasro, could not cope with the score. His singing proved amateurish. Lillian Eubank as Amneris, M. Horodas as the King, did not satisfy from any point of view. The interest centered on the singing of Olga Carrara, who, as Aida, proved to be an artist of routine. The singing of this splendid soprano was always nearly flawless and an artistic delight. In the "ritornà vincitor" she exhibited her powerful and beauteous organ. Taking it in all, Olga Carrara made good through the various proofs of a singing artist. Her voice filled the spaces of the huge auditorium, her phrasing was excellent, and her diction clear. Her work was that of a professional Aida, of the slave embodied ideally. In few opera houses is there an Aida who can do justice, either artistically or vocally. Olga Carrara carried her part magnificently. She will be worth watching.

Ernest Davis can be singled out as an intelligent Radames. His singing of "Celeste Aida" was pleasurable, and his ensemble work admirably done. Through repetitions he will not fail to improve his impersonation. Again his stentorian voice overcame the loud orchestra.

Mr. Volpe conducted the body of musicians with skill, while the chorus did some agreeable work.

The management, with its financial resources, could have provided better elements for the balance of the concerted parts. No amateurs should be permitted to stand alongside professionals. J. De V.

ANTHONY LINDEN

Anthony Linden, the well-known flute soloist and orchestral player, announces that, by reason of the increasing demand upon his services as a flute instructor, he will devote the greater part of his time the coming season exclusively to teaching in Chicago.

His instruction represents the most improved and progressive methods for pupils of all grades, with due recognition of the characteristics and individuality of the student.

Years of experience and close scrutiny of all methods have resulted in a system of flute instruction not founded upon one method, but comprehensive, logical, and independent.

Mr. Linden's teaching offers a rare opportunity to flutists preparing for a professional career, as well as to those desiring to confine their work to the amateur. Professionals will find in him a most valuable coach, both for solo and symphonic orchestral playing.

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK GOES TO EUROPE

Standing alone on the uppermost deck, well aft and away from all the other passengers, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, grand opera star, waved good-by to the land of her adoption for a short time and left for Europe on board the steamship Rotterdam of the Holland-American Line yesterday afternoon.

"I have done my duty to my country," said the singer, "and I must now do my duty as a mother. I hope to bring back the widow and fatherless children of my son, Lieutenant August, who lost his life when a German submarine of which he was the commander was sunk on her voyage from Germany to Austria early in the war. August was a fine boy, with all his sympathies for the United States, where he had expected to make his future home, like his mother and brothers. He was second officer on a Hamburg-American Line steamship when the war broke out and was drafted into the German navy.

"No one will know what his widow and children suffered during the war. I know that they had little to eat, and I hope now to find them in Amsterdam and to bring them back with me within a few weeks. I am an American and all my dear ones are Americans. I have lived an American and I shall die an American. America gave me my start in life and all that I have. In return I gave all I had for my country. I sang on platforms and on street corners for the Red Cross and the Liberty Loans, and I found out afterward how deeply Americans can give of their appreciation."

The singer then spoke of the three sons who had vounteered for active service for Uncle Sam, Ferdinand in the artillery Henry an ensign in the navy, and George Washington Schumann-Heink, who was born in the United States and became a gunner on a troop ship. George Washington Schumann-Heink is the singer's pride and hero, and between sobs at the recollection of the son she lost Mme. Schumann-Heink told of her three boys and their achievements in Uncle Sam's service.

"My other son, Walter, even underwent an operation on his foot in order to get into the service," she said.

The two grandchildren she expects to meet in Amsterdam are ten and twelve years old. Their father was thirty-six years old when he went down with his vessel in 1915. Mme. Schumann-Heink told of her reception in Washington when she applied for a passport.

"I had no one to speak for me and I thought I might find great difficulty in getting the necessary papers," she said. "Instead, I was treated like a queen, and there was not an official in the State Department who could do enough for me. They were all anxious to do something to get me through as quickly and comfortably as possible."

The singer has a married daughter living in Leipsic, but she does not expect to see her, as she stated positively that she would not enter German territory. She has booked return passage on the Rotterdam and expects to fulfill a charity engagement in Birmingham, Ala., the last week of next month, when she is to sing for the benefit of a school in that city.

"I am greatly touched by the death of Oscar Hammerstein," she said. "He was a genius and did a great deal to further the cause of good music in America. I am glad to see the Herald give prominence to his career, for the United States owes much to Oscar Hammerstein."—New York Herald.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

Northwestern University has just ushered out one of the most brilliant summer seasons ever held. Four of the closing recitals were as follows:

An Alumni recital was given on July 31 by Miss Harriette Kisch of the class of 1918, assisted by Miss Yerda Noren, soprano. Although this program was not heard by Music News, it is not difficult to assume that it was one of superior quality, if from no other reason than that the program is excellently chosen and representative of the best and most interesting in song and piano literature.

Two other recitals given on August 7 were representative of the splendid work done in the children's departments during the year. The first of these included a demonstration by classes in rhythmics, rhythmic stories and folk and interpretative rhythms.

One of the most interesting programs of the year was heard by this writer on the evening of the 5th, given by Miss Laura L. Schneider, a graduate student of Mr. Grant-Schaeffer. Miss Schneider possesses a voice of much potential possibility and has a very evident gift for interpretation.

She was assisted by Miss Madeline Ruff, one of the younger members of the faculty, who played two groups of old and modern compositions with artistic facility and great delicacy of style. Miss Ruff is well equipped both personally and technically and deserves much success in her future work.

The accompaniments were played by Miss Electa Austin with her usual keenness of insight. She is one of the few who are born to the art of accompanying.

MARY CARVER WILLIAMS.

JOHN LORING COOK

Mr. Cook announces that he is the Chicago representative of the Continental Lyceum Bureau and that he has at this time good-paying positions open for singers, readers and girl violinists wishing to go on the Lyceum Circuit this fall. Applicants can see Mr. Cook at his studios, 817-19 Kimball Hall, at any time.

"CAREERS FOR TWO" PROVES SUCCESSFUL IN NAMARA-BOLTON FAMILY

That a prima donna and a playwright all in one family can be a happy and successful combination is proven by the blissful married life of Marguerite Namara, the beautiful Chicago Opera prima donna, and Guy Bolton, her brilliant playwright husband. As a striking example of this rare domestic phenomenon Namara-Bolton has been extensively interviewed by lady journalists bent on telling an always interested world how it is done.

For example Aileen St. John-Brenon recently wrote in the New York Morning Telegraph: "It is usually a handful to have but one budding genius in the family. But two highly successful members in one household! Even the brave and dauntless might be excused the qualms and tremors of the scenes of professional jealousy under one roof. But if you were to drive past the Namara-Bolton household in Great Neck, and were fortunate enough to find one of the blinds up, a little scene would in all likelihood greet your eyes such as you see in all the pictures as the epitome of domestic happiness.

"Namara sings and her husband listens and chides and encourages and praises. There is nothing like having a home-grown critic. And then when Bolton writes a play, the scene of action is removed to the study and the roles reversed.

"On the occasion of a first performance or a first night, or a tryout of one or the other's enterprises both Mr. and Mrs. Guy Bolton are present either in front or behind the footlights. It may be Baltimore, or Washington or Chicago, it makes no difference, for as Namara will tell you the secret of their happiness is a genuine interest and understanding of one another's work."

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

By ELIZABETH FORESMAN BAGG
(Copyright 1919 by Mary Elizabeth Bagg)

PART VII

Correct Enunciation as an Aid to Voice Culture

Correct enunciation is rightly regarded as an important aid to good singing for several reasons. In the first place, it assists the pupil along the line of correct placement of the voice, whereas incorrect enunciation can easily distort and misplace the tone. Secondly, it helps to produce in the voice the carrying quality or resonance which is absolutely necessary for singing in public. Thirdly, it is one of the things which mark the difference between the cultured artist and the crude amateur.

The pupil has been taught, in our work of voice placing, to arch the tone; that is, to send it out from the roof of the mouth in a round, arched tone; and never from the back of the throat in a flaring, flat tone. This she has learned to do by means of little exercises in which she used simple vowel sounds like "A" and "O" and "E." Now, she is going to progress from the use of the exercises to the singing of songs. In these songs she will meet the same vowel sounds that she met in the exercises, with other sounds which go to make up the words of these songs.

If she forgets what she has been taught to do with her simple three or four vowel sounds, and begins, as many pupils do, to speak the words in the flat, nasal or slovenly manner which perhaps is that of her daily speech, what happens? The tone loses its correct placement, falls back into the throat, becomes flat, or nasal, or cramped or thick, or any one of the several things that her method of speech may happen to be. On the other hand, if she continues in words the correct placing she has learned in mere vowel sounds, not only will she have a voice that is beautifully placed, but one that has a carrying power, a resonance which makes it possible for her to be heard as easily in a hall or a theater as in the studio.

It is an unfortunate fact that we are not as careful as we should be of our speaking voices. Many of us who have nothing to fear on the score of grammar or style of speech, commit every moment crimes against clear and pure enunciation. Others of us have fallen into careless habits of pronunciation, caught in youth, perhaps, from those around us. Many of these tricks of speech are provincialisms; all of them are undesirable. A Frenchwoman of my acquaintance, who came to this country as a child, and learned her English in a small middle west village, told me that she was a grown woman before she learned that there was such a word in the English language as "new." She had always heard it pronounced "noo."

When we begin to sing we have to eradicate all of these faults. They are bad enough in ordinary, everyday speech—they are impossible in good singing. Teachers of dramatic expression work along the same lines in this respect as do vocal teachers, though they may approach the work with a different vocabulary. They both strive for the round, arched tone, and they both realize that the vowel and consonant sounds, correctly used, aid immeasurably in getting it.

Good enunciation is, I think, one of the advantages to be gained from a course of vocal study. The girl who is in the habit of saying "Heavun," "Dooty," "Bulieve," "Worrud," etc., instead of "Heaven, "Duty," "Believe" and "Word," will, when she has been constantly corrected for this evidence of incomplete culture, begin to take note of her speech and to try to improve it. Possibly an instinct to find out the reason for these corrections will lead her to a study of the vowel sounds of her language. She will begin to visit her dictionary, and great will be the benefit thereof. A teacher often realizes in the first interview with a pupil, perhaps before hearing her sing a note, that he has to deal with a nasal, twangy voice, or a rough, strident one, or a thick, characterless one; and he knows that as he corrects these evils in the singing voice a corresponding improvement will be made in the speech.

I have spoken of the vowel sounds as an aid, when properly used, to correctness of enunciation, but the vowel sounds are not the only things that we must watch in this connection. There are the consonants; the n's and m's, t's, r's and l's, with which we end our words. One cannot be too careful in the handling of these sounds. "Him" must be "Him" and not "Hima." Finish the word with a brief, clean-cut "m" formed by closing the lips, and pronounced just before the following word. For instance, if the word occurs on a note which is held, prolong your vowel sound, the "i" in him"; never try to hold the consonant. And keep it "i"—do not let it become "hi-um." The exercise given in an earlier chapter—"Softly Now the Light of Day"—taken on the notes of the slow scale, forms a very good practice exercise for this work. In the case of the liquid consonant "l" do the same thing; only form it by touching the tongue to the teeth, instead of closing the lips.

Consonants properly managed are a joy. I have sat in the last row of a balcony while a baritone was singing an Irish song, and have caught the "t" on "darlint," sung softly on a high note, as distinctly as though in the front row, and still there was no pressure on the note—no extra syllable added as is so often the case. This is good enunciation, and it presupposes intelligent work.

Give the broad "a" in "laugh" and "past" its rightful sound, and learn to avoid the burring sound of "r" which afflicts us of the Middle West. Do not be afraid to use your lips and tongue, for without their use you cannot articulate properly. So many pupils are afraid to do this. They have an idea that it means "mouthing," and that it will result in an unbecoming appearance. Mouthing is an exaggeration of the correct use of the lips, and of course is not at all necessary. But you must use lips and tongue in order to have a clear, distinct and expressive enunciation; and so far from being unbecoming, it will give your features an interesting and pleasing expression instead of the dead calm that hovers over an immovable countenance. Anyone who has heard and seen David Bispham, that master of diction, will, I am sure, agree with me as to this.

It has often been said of Sarah Bernhardt that people with only a slight knowledge of the language could understand her French, because of the perfection of her enunciation. The same may be said of Lucien Muratore, the celebrated French tenor, whose exquisite diction, in the much more trying milieu of opera renders his French so easily understood.

SINGER WEARS SEAWEED

Seaweed as material for feminine attire was given its first trial in this city at Willow Grove last evening by Miss Kathryn Lee, the American soprano, who is the soloist with Creatore's Band, which closes its engagement at the park tomorrow night.

Miss Lee appeared in a beautiful, soft, shimmering evening gown, which, because of its most unusual texture and quality, excited the interest of the women in the audience. The prima donna subsequently declared that it was the first time that she had worn the dress, and predicted that within a few months seaweed frocks would become quite the rage among fashionable women.

"While I was in Honolulu, several years ago," said Miss Lee, "I was attracted to the practical uses to which seaweed is put by the natives. I saw native dresses made of it, and thought if cloth could be manufactured from the softest varieties it would be adaptable for wear in this country. I had a quantity of this cloth made by the native weavers, and it was extremely beautiful when dyed various colors. I reserved this particular shade of material for an evening dress, and tonight is the first time I have worn it. Seaweed is not only a most unusual material for dresses, but it is also quite cheap."—Philadelphia Inquirer, July 25, 1919.

ROLLIN PEASE

The following interesting data is from a new circular:

Mr. Pease was born in Cambridge, Mass., in 1879, son of Daniel Pease and Katherine James, both good singers. Sang soprano in boy choir of Emmanuel Episcopal Church, La Grange, Ill. Graduated from Deerfield High School, Highland Park, Ill., in 1894; graduated A. B., Northwestern University, in 1898; won William Castle scholarship in Chicago Musical College in 1899, and studied repertoire with distinguished teachers of the Middle West.

A certain portion of time is allotted to teaching in the Northwestern University School of Music, and to the quartet of the First Congregational Church of Evanston. The remaining time is devoted to public engagements.

Managers and directors have found Mr. Pease well equipped for dependable work. He combines an inbred reverence for the classics with a keen appreciation of modern song idiom. He has a good general education, a voice of unusual range under excellent control, practical experience in artistic matters, and an intense enthusiasm for singing in all its forms.

Festivals

Chicago North Shore Festival, Northwestern University gymnasium, operatic night, Saturday evening, June 2, 1917. Conductors, Emil Oberhoffer and Peter C. Lutkin. Soloists—Alma Gluck, soprano; Rollin Pease, bass; the Festival Chorus of 600 singers; the A Cappella Choir; the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

Has also appeared at Bay View, Mich.; Peru, Neb.; Pittsburg, Kan., and other western music centers.

Recitals

Recital programs are built to suit the occasion. A balanced musical ration usually includes (1) an aria from some oratorio, (2) an operatic selection, (3) a group of classics, (4) folk songs, and (5) the timely and notable works of living Americans. Lecture-recitals covering definite styles and periods of singing are kept ready at all times.

In Chicago and vicinity within the last two years engagements have been filled at Northwestern and Chicago Universities, New Trier, Deerfield-Shields and Waukegan High Schools, Evanston, Englewood and Austin Woman's Clubs, Chicago Real Estate Board, Irish Fellowship Club, Presbyterian and Congregational Unions, River Forest Tennis Club, National Convention of Mu Phi Epsilon, and many other gatherings of music lovers.

Active part has also been taken in programs for the Illinois State Music Teachers' Association, Chicago Artists' Association, the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, the Fort Sheridan Hospital, Y. M. C. A. and other similar civic enterprises.

Oratorio

The Chicago Apollo Club, Harrison Wild conductor, engaged Mr. Pease to sing the bass solos in a special "Messiah" performance January 30, 1919, for the Civic Music Association, and re-engaged him for the regular Christmas 1919 performance in Orchestra Hall.

The Evanston Musical Club, Peter C. Lutkin director; the Minneapolis Philharmonic Society, the Duluth Choral Club, the Pittsburg (Kan.) Festival Choir, the University of South Dakota Chorus, and many other choral societies have heard and approved his authoritative delivery of "The Messiah" texts.

"Elijah," in the form of a great dramatic pageant, was presented five times at the New First Congregational Church under the direction of Dr. George L. Tenney. Mr. Pease was chosen to create the name-part.

The "Verdi Requiem," "The Creation," "Caractacus," "The Dream of Gerontius," "The Veil," "Stabat Mater," and many other standard oratorios are ready at a moment's notice.

Operas

"Aida," "Rigoletto," "Romeo and Juliet," "Samson and Delilah," "Traviata," "Cavalleria," "Trovatore," "Pagliacci," "Madame Butterfly," "Faust," "La Boheme," "Mignon," "Mikado," "Pinafore," and "Robin Hood."

Community Singing

Mr. Pease was song leader of the Northwestern University unit of the S. A. T. C. and also taught an early morning class in "Trig." He has led groups of every possible personnel in all kinds of places, ranging from the Taft meeting in the Chicago Auditorium to the Grant Park grand stand when Reilly's Bucks marched home in the rain.

Last spring a group of returning festival soloists were marooned at Tecumseh, Neb.

" . . . The musicians took their instruments from their cases, and, sitting on upturned suitcases on the platform between the train and the station, proceeded to have a 'Community Sing,' probably the most unique concert ever given in Nebraska.

"Rollin Pease of Chicago, the baritone of the festival, led the singing in a spirited manner, and in a moment over 200 of the waiting passengers were singing. Those who remained in the cars often called from the windows for their favorites.

"The sun was just sinking, and the soft light and balmy air, adding to the isolation of the people present, created a remarkable atmosphere of comradeship. During the singing a hat was passed and a goodly sum collected for the Red Cross. The little community was still singing when the arrival of the Kansas City train put an end to the concert."—Hazel Gertrude Kinscella in Musical America.

A LETTER FROM FRANCE

Chateauroux, France, June 25, 1919.

Music News: We spent four weeks at Brest. Among our most pleasant memories we will cherish the excursions that we made into the surrounding country within a radius of about forty miles. These excursions are under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., they are made by auto truck, and are entirely free to all men in uniform. As I have already stated in a previous letter, this one feature alone—the various sight-seeing trips conducted by the Y. M. C. A.—speaks eloquently indeed for the splendid work done by this organization in spite of all criticism, very little of which is really justified.

Our first trip in charming Brittany was to a small town by the name of Daoulas, about thirty-five or forty miles from Brest. We mounted our motor truck promptly at 8:30 a. m. in front of the "Flag Hut." There were about twenty-five of us—soldier boys, sailors, our congenial guide, our driver, Miss Tris, our pianist, Miss Browne; our soprano, and myself. It was a glorious morning, cool and sunny.

We quickly left the ungainly city of Brest behind us, and for several miles traveled along the wooded banks of the beautiful Elorn River. Our first stop was at the town of Dirinon. Here we visited an old and quaint church built in honor of St. Nonne, concerning whom a very interesting legend has been handed down by the peasants. The church dates back to the sixteenth century, is built in Gothic style with marks of the transitional Renaissance period. The spire was steep and of a style peculiar to this part of the country. In fact, all of the churches in Brittany and France seem to be built very much along similar lines.

At Landerneau they pointed out to us the "house of three pillars" (two of the pillars now remain), which was supposed to have been built by the English when they controlled Brittany—so long ago that nobody knows just when. It was really only after we left Landerneau that we began to enjoy the charm of the country. Our course took us on an upward slope, and vista after vista unfolded itself to us as we ascended. A panorama of small fields, forests, hills and vales, in the freshest and most brilliant of colors, such as is only possible in springtime with all nature budding and blooming. It must be remembered that here and in most of the European countries the land is divided into small plots of perhaps an acre or several in extent. Intensive cultivation is practiced in the 'nth degree. The big farms surrounded by barbed-wire fences as we know them in the United States are unknown and would be impossible here from the very nature of things. Each little plot is surrounded by an earth wall grown over with grass, hedges and bushes and lined with trees so closely and carefully trimmed that they carry nothing but a small round crown. Each patch again is of a different color from the other, according to the nature of the crop. Can you imagine the wonderful effect, the beauty and variety of coloring, when miles and miles of such lovely, undulating country are gradually unfolded before your eyes as if by magic? The person who has no appreciation of such beauty as this must be blind to all the finer things in life. And through it all one has constant evidence of the fine thrift of the French people. Every twig is carefully gathered and used for firewood, and every blade of grass cut for fodder. Even the very tops of the rocky hillsides which are too barren to be cultivated are made to yield their share, for the short bushes and coarse grass are cut and dried and likewise used for firewood.

We arrived at our objective point, Daoulas, at about noon and stopped at the Hotel de Commerce. There we sat down to a long table draped in spotlessly white linen and enjoyed a two-course dinner for 3.50 fr. We then walked to the old church of St. Anne. This is indeed an ancient relic supposed to have been built about the year 515. It represents the remains of a Roman cloister which later on, in 1175, was raised to the dignity of an Augustinian abbey. The only original part remaining is the front of the church, the side walls and remainder having been rebuilt, but the old Roman form has been preserved, conveying the impression of great strength and ruggedness. Inside large, roughly hewn timbers are thrown crosswise from wall to wall, supporting the vaulted roof, which is of wood and painted a sky blue. The whole makes a very curious effect. The square tower is detached and seems to belong to a later period, as it is built in Gothic style.

A very old lady was in charge of the grounds. After inspecting the church she took us into the walled courtyard of the ancient abbey. As we stepped inside the wall it seemed as if we had entered a bit of paradise itself. There was a square colonnade of Roman and Romanesque pillars, with a fountain in the center, and all about, to the extent of several acres, most carefully kept flower beds, trees and shrubs. A little to the side was the shrine of St. Anne—simply a tiny chapel, and adjoining it a spring surrounded by a wall of old masonry with several steps at one end leading down to the pool, and at the other a small shrine with figures of saints. The spring is said to have miraculous powers, especially for ailments of the eyes. It was all delightfully picturesque, and long we lingered, loath to tear ourselves away from the enchanting spell. But our time was limited and we had to go. Retracing our steps to the truck, we motored to the town of La Roche (the Rock) to visit the ruins of an old castle

As to Our Directory Columns

The name of every Musician in the United States—every Composer, every Manager, every Publisher, every Teacher, every School, and every Manufacturer of Music Instruments, should be in the Classified Directory Columns of THE MUSIC NEWS.

It is a fact today that Managers, Directors of Schools, Program Committees, Festival Directors, Lyceum Promoters—in fact, everybody who has to do with Musicians, has formed the habit, when the address of a Musician is wanted, of looking in our Directory Columns for it.

We have been told again and again,

"Your Directory Is the Most Useful List Published in the United States"

Even if you have no intention of doing more public work—even though you are located where no change seems possible—it is still advisable to have your name in our columns in order that your friends, the managers, the publishers and the public at large may have a ready means of finding your address.

And—if you ARE in the field for increased engagements or activities of any kind you will find no medium so useful as this.

We have Classifications for every Instrument, for the Voice, for Publishers, Manufacturers, Composers, Directors, Ensembles, Theory Teachers, Dancing, Dramatic Art, Clubs, Choir Boy Training, Pageantry, Community Singing Directors, Managers, Accompanists, Public School Music Teachers, and others.

If we have not your Classification we will create a Department for you.

The cost of this service is only fifteen dollars a year, but the service itself is invaluable.

During the last season we carried in the Classified Columns hundreds of names. We want to carry additional hundreds this season, and expect to make the list as near complete as we possibly can.

Payment for this service can be made Annually, Semi-Annually or Quarterly—and, as we send THE MUSIC NEWS to each one whose name is in these columns, you need have no further expense for subscription.

Display Advertising in MUSIC NEWS is considered today the most useful in America, and you will—eventually—be in the field for that. But, meantime, you should not delay one week in having your name in our Classified Directory Columns, for this is AN INVALUABLE SERVICE.

built by King Maurice away back in the year 800. We climbed to the very top of the rock on which the old walls stood, clambering among the ruins and enjoying a splendid view of the adjacent country. The very air was filled with the romance of the past, and the ruins themselves, even in their complete desolation, seemed to look down upon the country below in haughty defiance. It did not need a great stretch of imagination to see in one's mind a proud knight on his fiery steed, all clad in burnished mail, prancing up to the drawbridge with his retinue.

The afternoon was far advanced and evening approaching, though the sun was still high, as the days are long in this part of the world. We arrived back in Brest in time for supper. We gave a concert that same evening at the "Liberty" Hut ("Y") to about 700 men. Though we were tired physically, we were refreshed mentally, and I can truthfully say that we played with far greater vim and spirit than ordinarily, for had we not imbibed at Dame Nature's inexhaustible fountain of inspiration, and had we not been carried back in spirit to the dim past, when men lived as saints and fought and died even as they do now, though under vastly different conditions?

This, then, is a poor description of just one of the excursions it has been our good fortune to take. And yet many of our soldier boys—in fact, the vast majority of them—are leaving France with a wrong attitude of mind and with bitterness in their hearts, decrying the country and belittling its people. The truth is, though many have been here a long time, they have really seen very little of the country itself outside of their military camps and the towns and cities immediately adjoining. They simply have not made the effort to see it in reality, just as little as they have tried to acquire the French language, with the result that they do not understand the people and have not met the right kind. They imagined the French would come to them, and in this they have been mistaken, for France owes America no more (and probably far less) than we owe her. Besides, to my mind, there is nothing so tiresome and so destructive of a man's finer perceptibilities than a prolonged stay in a military camp. This is particularly true of the boys who are in the impressionistic age—from 18 to 25 or 26. I have even met secretaries from the several welfare organizations who were strongly afflicted with this attitude of mind, and at least one of them, whose name and organization I shall not disclose, strongly pro-German.

However, these excursions conducted by the "Y" are doing a great deal to bring about a better understanding and appreciation on the part of our men. But alas! there will always be those "who have ears and hear not, and eyes and see not."

Cordially,

JOSEF KONECNY.

Johnston—Lillian Thomas Johnston, soprano, has taken over the class of Mr. Albert E. Ruff, voice specialist, Kimball Hall, during the latter's absence in New York. Mr. Ruff has intrusted his class to her as the one best fitted to carry on his work. She has both studied and taught with him for years.

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC

(Taken from the Catalog of the Kansas City Conservatory)

One of the great fields recently opened in the musical world is that of public school music. The teacher of piano, violin or voice comes in contact with a somewhat limited number of pupils. The music supervisor comes in contact with several hundred pupils every day, and if her education and her personality and ideals are what they should be there is no person in a community who is able to exert such an influence over the musical development of the people, and assist the private teachers so much, as the music supervisor.

Two main essentials for this work are a broad musical education and the ability to handle large groups of children. Experience has shown that the highly educated musician who has not learned to deal with the large group is no more successful than the skillful pedagogue who can neither sing nor play. Therefore this department of the Kansas City Conservatory is so organized that the individual student may take the training most needed. If she has already a broad education in voice, piano, harmony, and history, she may devote most of her time to the study of classroom methods, solfeggio singing, pedagogy, community music, and directing musical activities of public schools. If, on the contrary, she is an experienced teacher in public schools but needs more musical training, due credit is given for her experience, and most of her time can be devoted to voice, piano, and theory. The fact that Kansas City Conservatory graduates are now successful supervisors in towns of the Southwest, and that all members of the class of 1919 were promptly placed in high-salaried positions, justifies the belief in this plan.

Mrs. Mary H. Flagg, who has been teacher of voice and director of the department of public school music in the conservatory for the past three years, is a woman who has made a deep study of music from early childhood, having studied piano, voice, history, harmony, counterpoint, composition, and orchestration with leaders in the musical world. She is an excellent pianist and has a splendid voice, singing in Italian, French, German, and English. She has had experience as soloist in both church and hotel, and in addition to sixteen years' experience teaching in public schools she has successfully taught both voice and piano, classes in harmony and history, and has directed juvenile orchestras and productions of cantatas and operettas.

Although Mrs. Flagg has had offers to devote her entire time to music teaching in schools of music, she prefers the public school work, where she is developing a series of textbooks for children. She is the author of "Stories of the Great Music Masters," "The Music Student's First Note Book," and "Wisht I Was a Soldier, and Other Verses." She has had several years' experience as music critic for a leading music journal and has written many articles on music teaching for educational magazines. She has composed a number of songs and a children's cantata, "The Child Jesus," recently published, concerning which The Music News of Chicago, in an editorial, says, "It fills beautifully a long-felt want for a really serious music work for children," and the Kansas City Journal says, "It has a decidedly classic atmosphere. It is a simple, sincere and earnest piece of work and should prove popular."

The course of study in public school music includes songs and methods for kindergarten, primary grades, elementary grades, junior high school, and high school; music appreciation as taught with talking machine in grade and high schools; a study of the piano and violin class systems recently added in many cities; orchestra and orchestration; singing games and folk dances; child pedagogy; the child voice, monotones, and classification of voices; rote singing, observation method, solfeggio and sight singing; scales and triads in the grades and harmony in the high school; glee clubs and the minstrel show; production of cantatas and operettas; conducting, and community music.

Students have the opportunity to visit classes in the public schools of Kansas City, and take demonstration course in singing, orchestra, and appreciation, under the direction of Mrs. Flagg at the Thacher School.

SYBIL COMER

Sybil Comer, the already popular soprano, has returned from a short vacation spent on a ranch in Nebraska.

She is singing at the First Presbyterian Church, a very busy and important position.

Miss Comer is gifted with a glorious voice and an abundance of personal charm and good looks. On the stage she is radiant, so it is quite natural that she should be sought by the light opera producer. But thus far she has refused the offers that have come, preferring, for a time at least, the concert stage.

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC

By LYRAVINE VOTAW

Many summer schools for supervisors of school music have been holding sway. It is a fine way for the school music teachers to find the very best way of presenting music to the thousands of children in the schools of our nation.

So long as human beings remain human there will be differences of opinion as to what methods are best adapted to the schoolroom needs.

A very pleasant day was spent with the body of over three hundred musicians who were enrolled in the American Institute of Normal Methods, which holds its summer school at Northwestern University, in Evanston. Mabelle Glenn of Bloomington, Ill., has won for herself an enviable reputation in her services with community choruses in that part of the state. She is one of the favorite instructors at the summer school. Alice Jones, supervisor of the Evanston school music, gave a very effective lesson for sixth grade pupils in modulation. In fact, the full session contained feast after feast for the teachers, who had been giving out all the year and were hungry to be filled for the coming season of giving again. Osbourne McConathy was chief director of the school, under the auspices of the Silver-Burdette publishing house.

The National Summer School of Music holds its session at Lake Forest amid the wonderfully restful surroundings of the Lake Forest College campus.

An exceedingly strong faculty administers here to the needs of the teacher-students. A very fine spirit of co-operation and friendliness prevails. Cyril Graham, a Chicago teacher and composer, is most inspiring in his lectures and classroom work in history, melodic construction and other instruction.

Mrs. Vernon tells them the "how" and "why" of presentation in the grades in a delightful manner. Glenn Woods of Oakland, Calif., is a "crackerjack" in the organization and management of bands and orchestras.

In fact, altogether, the entire summer session is a satisfaction to everyone who attends. This school is under the direction of Ginn & Co., publishers.

The American Book Company also has a session for teachers who wish to become more thoroughly acquainted with the Hollis Dann Music Course, of quite recent publication.

Aside from these schools, carried on by the book concerns, there are many schools under private management and connected with conservatories and music schools in general.

A most interesting morning was spent in the studio of Mrs. Effa Ellis Perfield recently, a report of which was in a recent issue.

Mr. Robinson, at the American Conservatory; an assistant in Mr. Carpenter's studios; Lyravine Votaw at the Dearborn School, and others, as well, have all ministered in a most effectual way to the needs of the school music teachers. Thousands of children in our schools will reap the benefit during the coming school year. There is probably no teacher who is all wrong, and equally it may be true that no one is all right, so it behooves each supervisor, especially those sufficiently experienced, to know all systems and either choose from among them or make his own.

Most prefer to make their own, and that is as it should be, although there is nothing new under the sun. One who is simply an imitator is not capable of teaching children how to sing and to love music. Hence, we must all be patient and tolerant with every method in existence, so long as that method be based upon sound psychological principles, which always consider the good of the child first.

Melodic and Harmonic

Some systems say harmony is paramount. Others claim that melody should be the main study in the first years. Why separate the two ideas? They are so closely related that one cannot rightfully do so. To be sure, melody deals with the horizontal of music, and harmony with the vertical, but melody is so based upon harmony that one must necessarily use harmonic basis to teach melody. The physical fact still remains that the child voice can sing melody and melody only, if the vocal flexibility is to be preserved, as it should be, in the lower grades.

Even though a child in the kindergarten can gain the ability to recognize notes and chords placed upon the F clef, and may sing from that notation, he still is singing in his own child quality and range. Rounds and canonic compositions are usable, and thus they may gain independence in singing consonances and dissonances. However, melody must remain the chief stock in trade for the child in the lower grades for singing purposes simply because God made him that way.

While he sings melody, it is also essential that he learn to hear harmony and feel it.

This is no doubt one of the reasons that class piano study in the public schools has sprung into such prominence recently. It is one of the greatest factors in the progress of our school music. This work, in addition to the singing period, is going to give the pupil a much earlier knowledge of the harmonic side which underlies the melodies they sing.

The piano classrooms are equipped with instruments for their work, whereas we find it impossible in many schools to place a piano in each classroom where the singing period is given.

What for the Little Tots?

Whether the first work at the school be in the kindergarten or the first grade, we find that the majority of the children in America come to their first school day with no musical vocabulary. Should we then begin with the analytical or the constructive? Should we teach the child to see and analyze a sentence before he can say it? Before a child learns to read from the printed page in his reader he has learned many words and sentences at home. Quite a vocabulary for talking our language is already in his possession when he enters the school door. He has probably four years of experience in that, whereas his musical vocabulary is exceedingly limited from the average American home. Should he not have a large fund of musical experience in song and in rhythmic expression before the technical part of musical notation is brought to his recognition?

It is not a question of whether the kindergarten is mentally capable of grasping it to a usable degree, for the child mind is exceedingly flexible and will absorb things which seem quite impossible.

Kindergarten experts and research students are constantly having to reprimand those of us who are so enthusiastic in what we wish to accomplish in the individual subject. It is a common error to wish to overcrowd the lower grades in a subject in order to give it an early start and to make its impress upon the young mind.

Enthusiasts in arithmetic, natural science, geography and other subjects have all had their try at it and felt they were justified in their experiment, because the child mind grasped it all so readily.

It is perfectly natural that the music enthusiast should wish to experiment in it also, and to think that because the child grasps it so thoroughly and so willingly that hence it belongs there. Nothing could be less true.

Again I say we must consider the child first, the subject second and the method last.

JENNIE F. W. JOHNSON

Music is the fourth great material want of our nature—first food, then raiment, then shelter, then music.

Jennie F. W. Johnson is one of the privileged few endowed with a voice of gold—a voice trained to sing to us, making music that washes away from the soul the dust of everyday life.

Jennie F. W. Johnson is 100 per cent American—and proud of it. She was born in the United States and in the United States she has pursued her studies.

Her experience in all branches of the musical field has spread over many years. She has given recitals in nearly every state of the Union, besides singing with the choral clubs of the following cities: Boston, Mass.; Cleveland, Ohio; Tiffin, Ohio; Chicago, Ill.; Springfield, Ill.; Aurora, Ill.; Decatur, Ill.; Wheaton, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Beloit, Wis.; Ripon, Wis.; Lafayette, Ind.; Howe, Ind.; Duluth, Minn.; Three Rivers, Mich.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Davenport, Iowa; Grinnell, Iowa; Sioux City, Iowa; Mount Vernon, Iowa; Tarkio, Mo.; Manhattan, Kan., and Yankton, S. SYBIL COMER, Soprano

Management Louise Quealy, Cable Building WABASH 1853 CHICAGO

MISS LEE'S HANDICAP

Kathryn Lee, the soprano, who is soloist at Willow Grove with Creatore, is scheduled to appear here next winter in concert. Very few who hear the singer are aware she was trained originally as a pianist and organist, and that until her sixteenth year she spent five hours a day perfecting her instrumental technic. Her early studies were continued against great odds, because of a foreshortened tendon in the fourth finger of her left hand. This meant that virtually every composition she attempted had to be refingered by her personally, in view of this weakness. She persisted so patiently, however, that she achieved excellent results, and has not only taught the piano, but is also an excellent accompanist. Even now her piano assistant, Raoul Biais, accepts Miss Lee's corrections and declares she is a better player than he.

"But, even at sixteen, I realized there is no such thing as a nine-fingered virtuoso for the piano," Miss Lee explains, "so I had a surgeon operate upon the tendon. It was no use. So far as the piano was concerned, the finger was worthless. I loved music so much that it was a heart-breaking blow. Then I discovered I could sing. What looked like bitter misfortune proved the starting point of a career."

Miss Lee's thorough musicianship was proved on one occasion when she was scheduled to rehearse a song, "Separation," written by the Countess Rudolphe Festetics. The manuscript had disappeared, and the singer felt she could not face the composer and confess her carelessness. So she rewrote the words and music from memory and also reproduced the elaborate accompaniment. When the countess arrived, Miss Lee submitted the "forgery" and confessed she had lost the original. For a moment the countess registered panic, but when the singer played and sang her version the composer was amazed and pleased. "It is virtually perfect," she said.—Public Ledger, July 20, 1919.

AN INTERESTING TRIP

Joseph H. Chapek, violinist, and his wife, Mrs. Augusta H. Chapek, left the city June 8 for an extensive trip. At Laredo, Texas, Mr. and Mrs. Chapek played at the Episcopal Church on the occasion of the marriage of their niece, Miss Helen Richter, to Horace B. Watson June 11, 1919.

After a visit to San Antonio, the former home of Mrs. Chapek, they left for San Diego, Calif. Arriving at San Diego June 27, they heard the news that the transport Nanking was coming to that port from Vladivostok, Siberia, with 1,045 Czecho-Slovak soldiers on board, the heroes of the World War who fought their way across Russia and Siberia and who were on their way home, going around the world to get to their loved ones.

The transport Nanking arrived July 3, bringing the veterans, who for the first time in five years touched the shore of peace at the beautiful port of San Diego.

They were heartily welcomed by Brig. Gen. Frederick S. Strong, commandant at Camp Kearney, and his staff; by the American Red Cross, with Field Director Major Ernest Riall; by the committee and members of the local Czecho-Slovak Alliance, the Salvation Army, and thousands of the citizens of San Diego and surrounding country. Also there were Mr. and Mrs. Chapek, both warm personal friends of President Masaryk.

Mr. and Mrs. Chapek took part in the John Huss celebration given by the Czecho-Slovak troops at Camp Kearney July 5 at the Y. M. C. A. Building. Mr. Chapek played a number of violin solos and also performed for the first time his new composition, "The Czecho-Slovak Republic March," which is dedicated to the Czecho-Slovak Army. The rendition was greeted with enthusiastic applause and Major Vladimir Jirsa, commander of the troops, went upon the stage to personally thank the composer.

On July 6 Mr. and Mrs. Chapek gave the soldiers another recital at the Y. M. C. A. Building at Camp Kearney.

Mrs. Chapek sang "Thou Lovest Me," her husband's composition, with violin obbligato, and, being recalled, she sang the Slovak national song, "Pod Tim Nasom o Keneckom." Answering to another recall, she sang the Bohemian song "Rada-rada." Mr. Chapek played his compositions, "Furiant," "Bohemian Dance," "Mandolina Capriccio," and for an encore Drdla's "Souvenir."

The Czecho-Slovak troops left Camp Kearney July 11, going from there to Washington, D. C., and then Newport News, Va., from whence they sailed for a European port en route for Czecho-Slovakia.

. . . . . .

On their return trip Mr. and Mrs. Chapek visited the Grand Canyon of Arizona and arrived in Chicago July 30.

They are busy with preparations for the coming season, which from all indications promises to be a prosperous one.

Editorial

PASSING COMMENT

The London correspondent of "Le Courrier Musical" (Paris), in its criticism of "Monsieur Beaucaire," now running in the English metropolis, dismisses the work of Marion Green (formerly of Chicago) with the curt statement that he pronounces French with "an American accent."

This accentuates anew the attitude of all Europe toward the language question.

In every one of the European countries they expect—nay, they demand—that any American appearing on their stages shall pronounce and enunciate their languages impeccably.

This they assume to be the one thing needful for logical or successful performance.

But—do the French and Italian artists carry the same feeling into their American work?

Not by any means. They have told us so many times that we ourselves believe it to be Gospel truth that Grand Opera is possible at its best only in French or Italian, and not only do we submit to this imposition from all foreign artists but we also allow them in their song recitals to use their own language exclusively if they choose, ignoring ours entirely.

They—all over Europe—criticize Americans who have not a perfect knowledge of their languages, even the most unlettered of the public being supercritical about the most minute questions of pronunciation.

And, in return, we allow them, when they choose to sing to us in our vernacular, to simply murder the English language.

We feel flattered that they should deign to learn even a song or two in our language, and we consider their mistakes and their abominable pronunciation as "cute" or "fetching."

The editor is in receipt of a letter from a distinguished American composer which contains so much food for thought that (by permission) he is printing it here in entirety.

It is, of course, an answer to the editorial statements that publicity (advertising, if you wish to call it so) is necessary for the composer as well as for the performing artist if he would attract and hold the attention of the public.

There are, however, many fine questions involved, and it certainly does seem that there is a lack of that colleague spirit in this country which in most foreign countries has resulted in a national music literature.

> "You cannot boost a man up a ladder if he refuses to climb."
> ANDREW CARNEGIE.

Certainly in France, for instance, composers help each other more than they do here, publishers are (probably) more keen to take up the work of French writers, and artists are (we are told) much more ready to boom their own (composing) countrymen than is the case here.

We still insist that publicity is a great factor—a very great factor indeed—but evidently there are other questions, and we invite a full, free discussion of the whole matter.

Whether you agree with us, or with the writer of this letter, or with neither or both, write your views to the editor and they will find place in these columns; and a complete airing of views may do much good at this time.

The letter (in entirety) here follows:

Music News: The publicity I have personally paid for in the past should justify a wider recognition of my work than I am receiving. My publishers agree that my work is of the first order, but on the old policy: "If we want good music we will import it," they have done nothing and I see myself waiting indefinitely for returns. And if artists will not sing my music without a "professional fee" (as they call it!) my life will not be long enough to see success. This stand of the artist is all wrong, and for this reason the American group on programs is always the light group at the end! One publisher who has seven of my best songs (published about eight years ago, at most exacting terms for the composer) sends me in $1.59 as royalties for the past year! Now I ask you, where does the American composer (and I am thinking chiefly of my colleague) come in with such a state of affairs? My career, as a composer, has cost me a small fortune. I stuck to my ideal—and have paid the bills. But aside from John Carpenter, Mrs. Beach and a few others, what composer can meet such demands and stick to his ideals—write up and not write down?

The former two composers have spent a large amount of money in advertising and in consequence they are known. I have spent a larger amount in helping to save this country the past four years, and, in consequence, have sacrificed my art. But my self-imposed duty has seemed the most urgent. I still have duties outside of my art and as all the advertising has not brought the result I desire, why go on?

If artists won't sing the songs unless paid, all the advertising in the world will not help matters. My music is known, but only sung occasionally, though most teachers I have met use it. In time, as Frederick Stock once wrote me, it cannot but be known, but I may not live to see the time! I should like to devote the royalties to a bed in the Paris-Chicago Hospital (for American students in Paris) and if the hospital goes up shall make this provision. The bed will only be endowed after my death, judging from results up to the present!

Mr. Carpenter's "Society for Publication of American music" is an admirable plan and I give it my full support and have written him concerning its future work, etc. I have written the most complete "Song Literature to English Classic and Verse" in existence and if I never write another song this work is sufficient to give me a place among the best writers in the United States. But the colleague spirit must be more highly awakened. I am sure I have that spirit toward my colleagues, and always have had. It is for them to have the same spirit towards me.

It is always unsafe to print a supposedly complete list of any one class of musicians, for there are practically certain to be unintended omissions; and, by the perversity of Fate, the omitted names are usually among the most important.

The Musical Courier of August 14 prints a list of woman composers, but strangely omits the name of Freer. Surely, Eleanor Everest Freer of Chicago, composer of a very great list of high-grade compositions, deserves a place near the top in any list of composers, either American or international.

THE DRAMA LEAGUE OF CHICAGO

Miss Bertha L. Iles, manager-director of the Drama League activities at the Municipal Pier, has been presenting many interesting programs in the Municipal Pier Auditorium. The work of the Drama League is twofold—on Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons Children's Hours are conducted in the Pier Auditorium, where lessons are given free in dancing, pantomime, chorus singing (under the supervision of the Civic Music Association), orchestra rehearsals and rehearsals of plays and children's operas. Each Wednesday at 2 o'clock a public performance is given and thousands of children attend. On Friday evenings the Drama League Civic Program is given in the Pier Auditorium, and many well-known musicians appear on the programs, together with groups of dancers from the city schools and clubs. This is a definite step toward a Civic Theater, for the audiences and actors represent all civic interests and soecial activities. Programs were presented August 6 and 8, as already noted in Music News.

EMIL F. MYERS AND LILA AUSTIN MYERS OF AMARILLO COLLEGE OF MUSIC SPENT SUMMER IN CHICAGO

Mr. Emil F. Myers and Mrs. Lila Austin Myers have returned to Amarillo, Texas, after spending a busy summer in Chicago studying and enjoying the concerts and opera.

They have set a high mark for the things to be done in their school, and have accomplished so much because of strict honesty and a straightforward manner of dealing in all things. Both are gracious, sincere, and this is why they have made friends and held them.

Mr. Myers is the founder and director of the Amarillo College of Music. The coming season will be the seventh year of its establishment. Mrs. Lila Austin Myers is the head and director of the piano department. Both Mr. and Mrs. Myers have devoted much time to the study of music and art, having been with private teachers of note as well as having had extensive study at Northwestern University in previous seasons.

The school at Amarillo offers a course of study in the departments of voice, piano, organ, violin, harmony, and dramatic art. A competent faculty of assistant teachers aid in the work of the school. The Dunning System is a part of the course offered. Mrs. Myers is organist at Polk Street Methodist Church and Mr. Myers is director of music.

The school's formal opening, September 2 this season, will find them in new quarters, where without a doubt they will enjoy one of the busiest years in the history of the school.

The great Panhandle of Texas is a pioneer musical field, and the gradual development of the natural resources of the country is bound to make it rich musically as well as commercially. The oil wells are proving their worth, and it is only in recent years that this great industry has been promoted. Amarillo is the largest city in this part of Texas, and might easily be called the center of music and commerce.

Mr. Myers has, in addition to his work of director of the college and teacher of voice, organized and conducted a spring festival, presenting "The Messiah" three times, "Elijah," "Creation," "Rose Maiden," "Holy City," "Pinafore," and other works. In addition to the choral works, artist recitals have formed a part of the musical life of the city. Among the soloists appearing in the past six seasons are: Warren Proctor, Christine Langenhan, Harold Henry, Charles Harrison, Mr. Van Duzee, I. E. Mutch, J. A. Johnson, Hazel Silver, Joseph Farrell, James Hamilton, Oscar Seagle, Evan Williams, Vera Curtis, Mabel Sharp Herdien, Charles Lutton, and Walter Allen Stults.

Three choral bodies combine for the festival, one from Amarillo proper and two from adjoining cities, where Mr. and Mrs. Myers have a guiding hand in affairs musical. Mrs. Myers is an aid and accompanist par excellence, and has given loyal support to the festival and played with success for many of the soloists appearing in Amarillo. Further announcements of the coming festival will be made later.

C. W. HESSON SELECTS JOHN LORING COOK AS MUSICAL DIRECTOR OF CONTINENTAL LYCEUM BUREAU

Mr. C. W. Hesson of Louisville, Ky., has just returned south after spending two weeks in Chicago, where he completed arrangements with John Loring Cook, the well-known teacher, to become the Chicago representative of the bureau, which operates largely over southern territory.

Mr. Cook has been teaching in Chicago since 1898, twenty-one years, actively engaged in training singers, and his long experience is of great value to the bureau in selecting and training talent. One hundred towns are now booked in Alabama and Florida, and the first companies leave September 15. A second circuit of one hundred towns is now being booked, and the bureau needs good talent at fair salaries. Young lady singers who play the piano, read or play the violin should see Mr. Cook at once in his studios, 817-19 Kimball Hall.

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE I. L. A.

September 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 are the dates for the annual convention at Hotel La Salle, Chicago, with a church service conducted by noted Divines on Sunday, 14th, and a reception Saturday evening, 13th. The Association is composed of about 1,200 concert singers, players, lecturers, entertainers, concert companies, cartoonists, pianists, violinists, and other instrumentalists of all kinds, bureau and concert managers and committeemen.

The exercises consist of concerts, lectures, papers, round table discussions of mutual problems, vocal and instrumental numbers by noted professionals. "Joy Night" is the annual frolic of original stunts and burlesques given by celebrities and is the richest mirth provoking event of the session.

"Informal Hour" at 4 p. m. daily is set aside for the hearing of artists, pianists, singers, intsrumentalists, lecturers, readers and entertainers by the convention, and assembled managers who are on the lookout for new talent with a view to making engagements. This is a rare opportunity for comparatively unknown talent to appear before the leading Chautauqua and Lyceum managers of the United States under the best auspices.

Applications should be made at once to Henry B. Roney, Director of Informal Hour, 1021 Leland Avenue, Chicago (Sunnyside 6912), who will give all particulars. Indications point to the most important meeting and largest attendance in the history of the International Lyceum and Chautauqua Association.

MUSICAL EXTENSION SERIES

Frank A. Morgan announces the second Musical Extension Series of Concerts to open at Orchestra Hall on October 30, with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, with Harold Henry as pianist.

Following dates will be filled by the Apollo Club, the Zoellner String Quartet and other organizations and individual artists.

These will be supplemented, as last year, with the Church Series, in which will appear Louis Kreidler, Ernest Davis, Frederica Gerhardt Downing, Zetta Gay Whitson and many others.

We quote the following from the very attractive circular being sent out by Mr. Morgan.

"The first series of Musical Extension concerts as given in the churches and Orchestra Hall included such well-known artists as Arthur Middleton, Paul Althouse, Carolina Lazzari, and others of unusual merit. The high standard established by the first series will be more than maintained during the season of 1919-20. The artists engaged are among the best-known American musicians. You will be interested in hearing them.

"I feel confident also that you will heartily approve the purpose of the Musical Extension idea, which is to offer good music at neighborhood centers, especially in the churches, and to increase the number of patrons of good concerts in the central part of the city. There is no better way to counteract influences that are not for the best.

"To assist in accomplishing this, the price of the season ticket has been placed within the reach of the general public—"high-class music at middle-class prices." Too often in this country the price for hearing the best music, as rendered by the best musicians, puts it in the class of luxuries.

"It is my hope to awaken an interest even among those who claim not to care for good music, but who may not have heard enough of the real thing to find out what it is. If given a fair chance, good music, properly rendered, will prove its right to be heard in every community and will also fulfill a worthy mission.

"It was most encouraging to find with what unanimity and approval the first series was received. This will be of material help in establishing it in other places next season. If the object of the series, and the artists offered, are considered worthy, a continuance of support by the friends of the series will be duly appreciated."

JEANNETTE DURNO

Jeannette Durno, the well-known pianist, assisted by Reba Johnson, the young violinist, who has recently been appointed as one of the Elshuco Trio, gave a most interesting program before members of Miss Durno's Summer class in the Durno Piano Studios in the Lyon & Healy Building, Thursday evening. Together they played the Brahms Sonata for Piano and Violin in G major. Miss Durno played Scarlatti's Pastorale and Capriccio, Debussy's "Reflections on the Water," and Chopin's G Flat Etude. Mr. Johnson's solo numbers were: "From a Wigwam" (Cecil Burleigh), "Indian Lament" and "Slavonic Dance" (Dvorak-Kreisler).

Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Bradbury of Duluth also contributed to the program, playing the Cesar Franck Sonata for Piano and Violin and one of Miss Durno's most gifted pupils, Helen Falk, played a group of piano solos.

The young people of the party were Wanda Nestman, Marjorie Pollock, Harold Fidler and Richard Vail; also Florence Smith and Dorothy Mulchay, who gave several dances in costume, including the Scottish Sword Dance. They also gave a concert at Great Lakes, where Mr. Roney was one of the song leaders during the war.

A TEACHER OF TEACHERS

Glenn Dillard Gunn, who this Fall begins his nineteenth season in Chicago, deserves to be described as "a teacher of teachers." Among his former pupils there are many now occupying important positions with the foremost institutions of the country.

Perhaps the most prominent of the former Gunn pupils thus engaged is Moses Boguslawski, whose brilliant recitals in New York during the seasons 1917-18 and 1918-19 put him definitely in the rank of the prominent American pianists. Mr. Boguslawski is now one of the important members of the Bush Conservatory, Chicago, a position which he assumed last season after several years spent as director of the piano department of the Kansas City Conservatory.

Another of Mr. Gunn's brilliantly successful pupils is Miss Mae Doelling of the American Conservatory faculty, who has appeared with the Chicago Symphony and American Symphony orchestras in recent seasons.

Miss Helen Desmond, who played 120 engagements in all parts of the country two seasons ago and who last season made a most successful appearance with the Young People's Symphony Orchestra in New York, is now profitably engaged in teaching in that city. Previous to these activities she studied with Mr. Gunn for six years, appearing with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under his direction.

Mr. Martin Bruhl of Burlington, Iowa, has varied his successful teaching career with two seasons of concertizing under Harry Culbertson's management. During these seasons he made appearances with the New York Symphony and Minneapolis Symphony orchestras.

Prominent in the Northwest is Aslaug Olsen Wright, director of the piano department of the North Dakota State Normal School, Valley City. Miss Florence Scholl has achieved similar distinction at Lombard College, Galesburg, Ill. Miss Florence Bettray of Racine and Milwaukee, a prize winner in the recent biennial contest of the Federated Women's Clubs; Miss Esther Linder, Miss Kathrine Kittelsby, Miss Florence Schubert, and Miss Lucile Manker are four of the twenty young artists presented to the Chicago public in recitals during the past three seasons who have made good as teachers. Miss Manker is one of the soloists with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra this season.

But the former Gunn pupil most conspicuously before the public is Edwin Schneider, accompanist to John McCormack. When Mr. Gunn began his career as a teacher in Chicago in 1900 Mr. Schneider was the first pupil who registered with him.

WINONA LAKE

A Splendid Performance of "The Creation," Under the Baton of H. W. Owens—A Day of Musical Contests

Reviewed by CHARLES E. WATT

If more people in Chicago knew what a delightful place Winona Lake is there would be a constant procession of people from the Illinois metropolis to and from the Indiana resort.

Not alone is the place beautiful and attractive from the nature standpoint, and socially desirable because of the throngs of intelligent and charming people who go there, but also as a Chautauqua Assembly it is par excellent.

Day after day, throughout the summer, there are lectures and concerts given in the Auditorium, morning, afternoon and evening, and thousands upon thousands assemble to hear every sort of entertainment ranging from the noisy Billy Sunday to the very finest sort of classical music programs.

THE AUDITORIUM, WINONA LAKE

H. W. Owens has for sixteen years been at the head of the music department at Winona College and also in charge of the choral work at the Chautauqua.

He has a large Choral Society, recruited from the residents of Winona itself and of Warsaw, the neighboring city, and to this each year he adds a goodly quota of Chicago singers (from the Haydn Choral Society), and these, year by year, make the Winona trip their summer recreation and delight, as well as affording sterling assistance to their mentor and director, Mr. Owens.

For this year the chosen oratorio was "The Creation," and it was given on last Wednesday evening to the largest audience this writer has seen at the Winona Auditorium for five years.

Mr. Owens is absolutely adept in his manipulation of the Haydn Choral score, and the readers of Music News will remember that, very recently, he gave a successful performance of it at Elkhart, Ind., with the large choral society which is maintained there under his direction.

At Winona, on Wednesday, the chorus was not the largest ever observed there, but it was of excellent quality, both in the matter of voices and in general musicianship, and the performance resulting from this combination was pleasurable indeed.

Of the well-known chorus numbers, "The Heavens Are Telling" was the best, although "The Lord Is Great" was also exceedingly successful, this being, perhaps, due largely to the fact that the trio obligato with which it is embellished was done at this time in super-excellent style.

For the same reason, i. e., the fact of the splendid work of the soprano and bass in the obligato duet, "By Thee With Bliss," was put forth in a way to absolutely thrill the audience and to prove anew the excellence of chorus and soloists.

Mr. Owens held all the forces together with a practiced and artistic hand, and the unusual brilliance and finish of the chorus was augmented in a very telling way by the work of the accompanying organist and pianist.

The organ was used but little, but in those brief moments Miss May L. Hunter proved herself adept.

To the pianist, however, must fall a very unusual meed of praise, for not only was her work practically continuous, but it was also done at such a point of style and finish as is very rarely attained under like circumstances.

The body of support given the chorus was remarkable in rhythmic impulse and in solidity of foundation, while the piano background afforded the soloists was exceptional from every possible standpoint of the musician and the accompanist.

This unusual work was done by Katherine Norris Carmichael, an accompanist from St. Louis, who is spending the summer at Winona Lake, and who, on last Saturday night, played the recital program for Rosa Olitzka.

She appeared also very recently in joint recital at the Winona Auditorium with Mrs. Lincoln Dickey of Cleveland, Ohio, at which time she not only accompanied Mrs. Dickey, but also sang a group of solos and alternated with the principal singer in piano groups.

In September she returns to St. Louis, and will take up her new duties as organist at the fine West Presbyterian Church.

Certainly a talented and versatile young woman is Miss Carmichael.

Two of the solo singers at Winona on last Wednesday were the same as heard at Elkhart recently.

These were Miss Margaret Watts Owens and Dr. Carver Williams, soprano and bass.

H. W. OWENS

Miss Owens again demonstrated the fact of fine natural voice and an abiding musicianship and good taste.

She employs her voice to the very best of its possibilities and not only is able to sing the brilliant passages provided by Haydn with skill and effect, but also, in the abounding tenderness and sentiment of the score, she finds employment for many finer graces and decidedly artistic touches.

"On Mighty Pens" was sung by her so well as to leave in memory no better presentation of the song, while "With Verdure Clad" was a bucolic delight and a feast of good song.

KATHERINE NORRIS CARMICHAEL
Accompanist

Haydn was certainly partial to the bass score in writing his famous oratorio, and Dr. Williams proved himself, on Wednesday, entirely capable of coping with every difficulty provided and of accenting every suave delight of the part.

DR. CARVER WILLIAMS
Basso

The descriptive recitative, depending so vitally on clear enunciation, was done beautifully, the low tones with which the score abounds were handled with adroit effect, and the beautiful duets with the soprano and the trios (tenor, soprano and bass) were sheer delight.

The third soloist was Andrew C. Grant, who, as director of music at the Austin (Chicago) M. E. Church for some years, won a wide circle of friends for his personality and his voice, and who is now equally popular in his position as director of the music at Edison Park M. E. Church (Chicago).

Mr. Grant has a very sweet and thoroughly suave voice, and his feeling for oratorio is correct and pleasing.

"In Native Worth" was sung with great intelligence and fine musical effects, and in the aforementioned abounding duets and trios of the Haydn composition he found opportunity for the display of correct musicianship and a thoroughly fine style.

The audience, as stated before, was very large, and it was also unusually enthusiastic.

Each soloist was applauded to the echo, the chorus was most royally rewarded in

HOMER RODEHEAVER,
Composer of "Lonesome"

applause, and Mr. Owens was given that same round of appreciative handclapping which is, seemingly, reserved in its fullest manifestation for him alone.

Concert on Wednesday Afternoon

The concert of Wednesday afternoon was a very attractive one and was made doubly interesting through the presence of a large contingent of Chicago singers, who had come down to participate in the Wednesday evening oratorio and in the contests of Thursday.

Among those taking part were Margaret Owens, who made a big success with "The Song of the Soul"; Mary Woods, who was excellent in "Mother o' Mine"; Harry Fetters, who sang "Three for Jack" with effect, and Andrew Grant, whose fine tenor voice was heard to much advantage in "Sound an Alarm," from "Judas Maccabeus" (Handel).

The Thursday Contests

Thursday was full of excitement to many young singers from Chicago, Van Wert, Ohio; Venedocia, Ohio; Warsaw, Winona Lake and other points, for there were "preliminaries" all morning and public contests all afternoon and evening.

These annual contests were introduced to Winona Lake some years ago by Mr. Owens, who has a strong predilection to the Welsh Eisteddfod, and whose singers, as soloists and en masse, have won distinction

MARGARET WATTS OWENS

in various gatherings of this kind, including the well-remembered occasion when they won (as a Choral Society) the thousand dollar prize at the San Francisco Exposition.

During the day there were contests for soprano, tenor, contralto, baritone, various duets, trios, quartets and other ensembles, to say nothing of a reading, which last, it must be confessed, was a bore inasmuch as but one contestant appeared; and she, in her rendition of "The Man Without a Country," was for the most part inaudible.

"The Eisteddfod," said the Rev. J. A. Gordon in introduction, "is a place where the adjudicator (critic, if you like) tells the exact truth about each thing that is done and nobody thinks of getting mad at him."

AMERICAN CONSERVATORY

The American Conservatory, in its new catalogue and in the Bulletin for August, sets forth the musical achievements for the term just closed and announces many interesting events for the new school year. The season 1918-19 proved an exceptionally successful one, the attendance increasing over 500, including an unusual number of talented students.

Among the faculty but few new names will be recognized, the policy of the school being to retain and keep together the many distinguished artist-teachers who compose the faculty, many of whom have been connected with the conservatory for over twenty years.

A notable addition is Mrs. Letitia Kempster Barnum, who will assume the direction of the dramatic art and expression department. Mrs. Barnum, in accepting this engagement, also will retain the presidency of the Chicago School of Expression, of which she is the founder.

Other additions are Frank Parker, voice; Stella Roberts, violin; Gertrude Polk, physical expression.

The conservatory announces a very complete and interesting series of recitals, including thirty-two Saturday afternoon recitals at Kimball Hall, operatic and dramatic evenings, orchestra concerts, etc.

PIETRO YON TO MAKE A TRANSCONTINENTAL ORGAN TOUR

Pietro Yon, a graduate of the Royal Academy of Saint Cecilia and subsequently the organist at the Vatican, is to make an extended organ concert tour this season, his itinerary including the leading American and Canadian cities between New York State and California. Mr. Yon is the most distinguished organist in the United States at the present time, and is likewise the most prolific and intelligent writer of music for the organ. His studio at Carnegie Hall in New York has developed the Italian music art to a high degree of perfection, and the invitations which have been extended to him to return for subsequent concerts after his first is an indication that the American public is not unappreciative of the best American musical art. He is the leading exponent of the organ music of Italy, not only the church music but the more general and popular form as well.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY ENGAGED FOR INDIANAPOLIS AND LOUISVILLE FESTIVALS

Mrs. Ona B. Talbot, the Indianapolis manager whose festivals in Indianapolis and Louisville were so successful the past season, has decided to make them annual events. For the coming Spring she has engaged the Russian Symphony Orchestra (Modest Altschuler, conductor) for Indianapolis on May 5 and Louisville on May 8. Other engagements made by the manager, Daniel Mayer, for this organization during the past week are in Mrs. L. C. Naff's course in Nashville, Tenn., at the Southern Textile Exposition in Greenville, S. C., and in Roland T. Hamner's course in Lynchburg, Va.

The orchestra will devote almost its entire Fall tour to the South and Southwest and will be in that section during November and early December.

SIBYL SAMMIS-MAC DERMID

Sibyl Sammis-MacDermid, soprano, is concluding her summer tour in Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania cities as the principal music attraction on the Redpath Chautauquas for that section. The press has accorded Mrs. MacDermid superlative praise throughout the tour.

Mrs. MacDermid will join her husband, James G. MacDermid, for a few weeks' recreation in Michigan, following which she will reopen her own studio in the Fine Arts Building, September 15, and will devote considerable time to a class of pupils that has accumulated, particularly since the beginning of the war, from different parts of the country where Mrs. MacDermid has appeared in concert. She will continue her concert and recital work as formerly.

GILDEROY SCOTT

One of Mme. Gilderoy Scott's important orchestral bookings for the coming season is an engagement to sing Elgar's lovely "Sea Pictures" with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra on December 21.

HENRY ON VACATION BEFORE A BUSY SEASON

Harold Henry closed his concert season in the East the middle of July, shortly after his triumphal appearance at the biennial convention of the National Federation of Musical Clubs. Since then he has been in Chicago, busy with a large class of professional pupils who came from all parts of the country. So great has been the demand for lessons from this popular pianist, and so talented have been the applicants, that Mr. Henry has been unable to resist the temptation to devote much more time to this work than he had allotted to it. He brought his teaching to a close August 20, and because he will open his next season early in October in the middle West he has gone up into the Canadian woods to spend his holidays instead of going to New England as he had planned doing. He expects that a month of outdoor life will get him in fine condition for the big season that is before him.

Mr. Henry has been booked for appearances in almost every part of the country, both with orchestra and in recital. One of his first engagements is as soloist with the Cincinnati Orchestra on October 30, in Chicago, when he will play the Liszt E flat Concerto.

San Francisco—At the 119th organ recital given by Edwin Lemare on the municipal organ at San Francisco the solo singer was Marion Vecki, among his numbers being "Values," by Frederick Vanderpool.

Hadley—The Hadley Concert Company is touring Iowa and Illinois this week.

Music at RAVINIA PARK

THE LOVE OF THREE KINGS

A mosaic of finest possible pattern and the most delightful of coloring is the score of "Love of Three Kings," which has not been given in Chicago enough times to spell satiety for any considerable part of the opera-going populace and which is so well presented at Ravinia as to make comparison with the Auditorium productions entirely legitimate.

Of course, at the Auditorium there was a remarkable setting for both the productions of the work made there, but on the other hand, neither of them compared in the matter of cast with that of Ravinia.

This may seem a bold thing to say, but it is a matter of sincere opinion that Florence Easton, Morgan Kingston and Leon Rothier have not been surpassed anywhere, if indeed they have been equaled, in the parts of Fiora, Avito and Archibaldo.

The scenic investure was appropriate and effective, even if not gorgeous, and the stage management at Ravinia last Saturday night was superb.

All the smaller parts were excellently done, the participation of the chorus was artistic and altogether in the proper spirit, while the work of the orchestra, under the direction of Gennaro Papi, was at a point of excellence which far surpassed any remembered readings of that score at the Auditorium.

Fine indeed is the imagery and the effect of the Montemezzi music.

The heavy, measured figure which accompanies every appearance of the blind old King is superb. The Fiora and Avito motifs are scarcely less impressive, and the weaving of all these together constitutes one of the most graceful as well as intensely dramatic scores of operatic history.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra revels in such music and, as said above, the rendition at Ravinia could not be bettered.

I never go to Ravinia on an Easton-Kingston night but that I marvel at the mistaken policy which confined Miss Easton, while a member of the Chicago Opera Company, to a few roles, mostly Wagnerian.

This wonderful woman, who is, incidentally, a delightful singer, is more versatile than any singing actress ever put forward by the Chicago Company, not excepting Mary Garden herself.

Florence Easton can do any sort of part, and she does every one she attempts to perfection.

In "The Love of Three Kings" she not only sings delightfully, but she presents also a dramatic picture which is beyond praise.

And in Morgan Kingston she has such a worthy partner as could be found but infrequently.

He is particularly handsome in the part of Avito, dresses it with exquisite taste, and his action is a proper admixture of dignity and passion.

Certainly no one could be more tragic or passionate than is he in the remarkable second act, and if the action of the last act provides him no similar dramatic opportunity it does at least allow a chance for passionate singing of the most effective kind.

Morgan Kingston—always a favorite at Ravinia Park—has sung so well this year and has shown himself also so fine a student of dramatic art as to have advanced himself beyond belief.

The part of the old King was done magnificently by Rothier, who has the exact face, figure, voice and dramatic outlook necessary for this tragic, unbelievably cruel part.

Philine Falco did the small part of Angella so exceptionally well as to warrant again the assertion that she has a voice and an acting talent so marked as to bear watching, in the full belief that her growth and advance will be rapid.

Thomas Chalmers, in Manfredo, was well cast. He sang well and acted with discretion.

Concerts at Ravinia

The concerts at Ravinia, under direction of Richard Hageman, have been a summer-long delight, and those of the closing days should receive the special attention of the music-loving public which, after their cessation, will find themselves for several weeks almost without high-grade concerts in Chicago.

On Monday evening of last week a Symphony was played, together with some Overtures and a solo each from harp and violin.

On Thursday, Friday and Saturday afternoons the concerts were, respectively, devoted to a program suitable for children, one especially built for sailors and soldiers, and a program of works such as an operatic overture, a waltz by Godard, "Les Preludes" of Liszt, etc., while on Friday night a very similar list was offered.

This schedule, with a concert also every Sunday afternoon, is repeated each week.

Return of Scotti

The enormous success of Scotti on the occasion of his two appearances in July augurs convincingly that there will be capacity audiences for each of the three additional performances for which he is now announced.

The first of these is tonight (Friday), when the bill will be "L'Oracolo," in whch he will sing the part of the Chinaman, which under his manipulation has become a classic of the grand opera stage, and in one act of "Butterfly" will present the Sharpless which is standard at the Metropolitan in New York.

On Friday evening, August 29, he will appear in a complete performance (four acts) of "La Boheme," an opera in which he is unknown to Chicago, and on the first day of September his engagement will close simultaneously with the season at Ravinia in a gala performance which will include "L'Oracolo" and "I Pagliacci," in which latter opera he will sing the part of Tonio.

Other Operas

On Saturday evening, August 23, "Romeo and Juliet" will be given, and on Sunday evening the splendid "Love of Three Kings" will be repeated.

Story of "L'Oracolo"

Scene—Chinatown, San Francisco.

The opera is called "The Oracle" because of the prophetic power of the sage, Win-Shee.

An opium den proprietor, Chim-Fen, tries in vain to win as his wife the lovely Ah-Joe, niece of a prosperous merchant, Hu-Tsin.

She loves San-Lui, son of Win-Shee, and he loves her.

At the early morn of New Year's Day they meet and tell each other of their love.

Hu-Tsin, seeking knowledge of the future of his son, Hu-Chee, consults the Sage, who foretells tragedy.

Shortly after this Chim-Fen kidnaps Hu-Chee, hiding him in the opium den. He then asks for reward, provided he can restore the child to Hu-Tsin—the hand in marriage of his niece, Ah-Joe.

To this Hu-Tsin agrees, making the same agreement with San-Lui, provided he finds Hu-Chee and restores him to his father.

San-Lui, suspecting Chim-Fen, enters the den, finds the child, and brings him out.

But Chim-Fen, who has followed them, kills San-Lui and again hides Hu-Chee. The cries of San-Lui as he died have been heard. The crowd assembles.

Ah-Joe goes mad at the sight of her dead lover. Win-Chee, nearly overcome at his son's fate, strangles Chim-Fen as the guilty one.

As a guard approaches Win-Shee props up the dead body of Chim-Fen and appears as if in conversation with the merchant as the guard passes.

Then he calmly departs and the body falls with a thud to the floor.

MILDRED SMITH

A neat little circular is being sent out by Mary Peck Thomson in introduction of Mildred Smith, contralto.

Miss Smith, the possessor of a beautiful voice, is a Chicago girl who was a member for some time of the American Opera Quartet, with which she made many successful tours. She is contralto soloist at the Hyde Park Baptist Church.

Godfrey—Eleanor F. Godfrey, joint director of the Chicago Piano College with Harmon H. Watt, is spending the month of August at Stone Harbor, N. J.

ANNA GROFF-BRYANT

Anna Groff-Bryant, director of the School of Three Arts, Lombard College, and local concert manager of Galesburg, Ill., has returned to Chicago after a two months' sojourn in New York City. She will remain in the city until the latter part of the month, when she will return to Galesburg for the opening of the school year, which promises to be one of the greatest of recent years.

The concert season is to be one of the most brilliant ever presented in one season and already includes such names as Mme. Galli-Curci, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Alma Gluck and Efrem Zimbalist in joint recital, Jascha Heifetz, Frances Ingram and Mlle. Magdalene Braed. The season will be divided into a fall, winter and spring series.

THE NATIONAL AMERICAN MUSIC FESTIVAL AT LOCKPORT, N. Y.

On Monday morning, September 1, at 10 o'clock, the first session of the Lockport Festival will be held, and present indications are for the largest attendance and the greatest enthusiasm ever in evidence in such an event.

There will be three sessions a day for the entire week, the festival closing with a gala concert on Sunday evening, September 8.

Harpster — Georgia Harpster, soprano, who has lately taken up her residence in Chicago, is a singer of great talent and of the finest training. She has made a splendid reputation in Omaha, which city has been her home for the past few years. She is also known as a fine singer on the Pacific Coast, where she has appeared extensively.

McMahill—John W. McMahill Jr., president of the McMahill Conservatory of Music, presented some added teachers to his faculty in an interesting recital last Thursday evening at the conservatory. A very successful meeting preparatory to the coming season was also held and many different things of interest discussed by the teachers.

Bonner—Elizabeth Bonner of Philadelphia, a Witherspoon pupil of several seasons, has returned to Philadelphia after the summer session with Mr. Witherspoon at Chicago Musical College for a vacation of some weeks before again taking up her work in New York with Mr. Witherspoon.

Ryder—Sturkow-Ryder's delightful piano bagatelle, "Imps," has been published by Schirmer.

Blackmore—John J. Blackmore has returned to Chicago from a short trip to New York.

Colgan—Alma Colgan, pianist, will reopen her Little Rock, Ark., studios in the fall.

AT ORCHESTRA HALL

If you wish to hear the organ at Orchestra Hall played at its full powers of brilliance and concert effect, go this week and listen to the music played by Mildred Fitzpatrick during the International News "Topics of the Day."

The composition used (which I cannot name) is oriental in character, and is a really remarkable piece of work. It is presented in wonderfully effective style.

The special soloists of the week are Alvina and Gladys Petersen, soprano and mezzo-soprano, artist pupils of Tracy Kingman, Chicago, teacher of voice.

These young ladies are of engaging personality. They dress beautifully, and their voices, individually fine, produce a perfect blend.

The soprano has a particularly sweet quality on the ascending scale, and the tones of the mezzo are rich and full.

They have musicianship, good method and fine style, and their interpretation of "When Shadows Fall" (Keithly) and "Awake, Dearest One" (Ball) are at a high point of intelligence and effectiveness.

If these young singers retain their present unaffected and artistic style and the unspoiled beauty of voice now in evidence, they will certainly attain a fine place.

The big picture this week is "The Valley of the Giants," in which the beauty and heroism of Wallace Reid (a matinee idol) finds pleasing outlet, and the other features of the bill are at the usual point of excellence. Next week, Billie Burke in "The Misleading Widow."

C. E. W.

Craven—Carl E. Craven, tenor, 422 Fine Arts Building, returned Monday from a three-day independent Chautauqua trip with the Hadley Concert Company—15th and 16th at Columbus Junction, Iowa, and August 17 at Lincoln, Ill. He sang Wednesday evening with the La Salle Quartet at Edgewater Beach Hotel. Mr. Craven is engaged to sing as substitute next Sunday, August 24, at the Church of the Redeemer under the direction of Robert Birch.

Neumann—Mr. and Mrs. F. Wight Neumann of 3155 Michigan avenue left the "Balsams," Dixville Notch, and are now at the Profile House in the White Mountains. They expect to motor via New Hampshire, Vt., to Long Beach, L. I., the latter part of this week to visit friends.

Wessman — Mildred Wessman, Chicago contralto, and mother, were visitors at Winona Lake, Ind., last week.

A TRIBUTE TO HENRI VIEUXTEMPS

An Appeal to All Music Lovers in America

By ARTHUR HARTMANN

Over one hundred years ago, and within the first twenty years of the nineteenth century, the little country of Belgium gave the world a number of great men destined to influence and mold the future art of violinists. They were, successively: Charles De Beriot, born Louvain, February 20, 1802; Lambert Joseph Massart, born Liege, July 17, 1811; Hubert Leonard, born Bellaire, near Liege, April 7, 1819, and Henri Vieuxtemps, born Verviers, February 20, 1820.

To the first and last of those enumerated is universally conceded the honor and glory of having been the founders of what has since been styled "the Franco-Belgian school of violin playing." While it is not the object of this article to seek controversies on violin matters, it can well be claimed that practically all the violinists of first rank for fifty years back have either issued directly from this school or were influenced by the style of playing created by the Franco-Belgian art.

Music, though the youngest of the arts, has made the most rapid and revolutionary strides, notably in recent years, so that a large portion—yes, we may as well admit from the start, the majority of the compositions from the pen of De Beriot and Vieuxtemps (Massart and Leonard not having been gifted with any distinguished creative spark) are antiquated and often insufferable to our ears.

Notwithstanding, the fact remains that certain compositions of these two masters are absolutely indispensable to the ducation of all violinists, and there is no violinist living today, however great, who can well avoid playing some one thing or other of Vieuxtemps. Musicians may well contend that the music of Vieuxtemps is all that his name implies—vieux (old) and temps (time), "old-timer"—yet we can search in vain for works which in dramatic intensity, in daring virtuosity and effectiveness equal the first, third, fourth and fifth concertos. And when we recall that the first great concerto was written by Vieuxtemps when but eighteen years of age the case may well stand as being without a parallel. To my critical judgment the Fifth Concerto represents a unique achievement in violinistic art, and is exemplary for its beautiful symmetry, skill and art of construction and its wealth of noble and musically dramatic utterances.

Had Vieuxtemps created nothing but this work it should have eternally obligated all violinists to a service of grateful homage and recognition. There have been many writers for the violin who have been innovators in left-hand display, and many whose compositions tax all the possible combinations of right-hand technic—namely, the manifold styles of bowing—yet there is none which demands of the player's endurance, musicianship, poesy and full technical equipment more than this aforementioned Fifth Concerto.

The centennial of Vieuxtemps' birth—February 20, 1820—is almost upon us. Were it not a fitting tribute for all violinists in this country, the thousands of students who have already mastered the first struggles and the yet other thousands now beginning their elementary work in the public schools throughout this land—were it not a token of grateful recognition for each to contribute toward a monument which should be placed to the eternal glory of one of the greatest violinists, composers and teachers of all time?

For several years past it has been secretly one of the ardent wishes of my life to be instrumental in helping toward this object and also to help stem the tide of prejudice and ignorance in a true appreciation of Vieuxtemps' potential influences. I have not yet formulated any definite plans as to the details in getting the monument or where it might appropriately be placed. As a general outline I would first appeal to every violinist, violin student and lover of the violin to make as large a contribution as his or her enthusiastic impulse may prompt, and would suggest as a minimum a "silver offering." Then, to further aid this sum, doubtless concerts could be arranged in the larger cities in which Vieuxtemps' works (also those with violoncello) could be performed. My idea would further be to have an American-born sculptor make the monument, possibly in open competition, and to have various local committees take up the matter in counsel and thus finally arrive at a decision as to where the monument shall find its lasting place.

In appealing to all music lovers to join in giving tribute to one who helped create the art, technic and musical literature of the violin, America would be giving but another expression of her appreciation of Belgium's greatness and, at the same time, encouragement to America's artists.

Contributions sent me will be receipted for by me personally and a strict accounting given of the funds. As a humble tribute to the genius of Vieuxtemps I take the liberty of quoting a few words I wrote in the Musician many years ago on Vieuxtemps' Fourth Concerto, suggesting to students that they take the piano part and peruse it note by note, phrase by phrase, up to the point where the solo violin is introduced:

"He sits in a room, deeply meditative. Days and nights he has felt the air pregnant with moods, with shyly quivering shades, ecstatic, poetic. He is now enveloped in the mists of religious fervor—expectant, absorbed. One may well say he is almost formless—a soul without a form. From out of space infinite he has caught one note which he fastens, humbly grateful. From the realms of Love another note springs to its side, then a third, and now the quivering soprano supplicates in the great chorale, magnificent—sublime!

"'In the beginning was chaos,' reads the world's history, and thus has this great magician conjured from Space his bouquet of vibrant colors. Now the pizzicati of the double-bass, the short, sharp interruptions of the horns and trumpets pulsate warmth and earthly life. The risings, the falls, the almost pitiable attempts to re-establish the heights of the gods set in, and soaring mid-air, we soon reach the climax of Despair. Then the crash, the sob, the relentless sharp pricks of the trumpet, the slow mumblings of the celli—the bleeding world looking up to its Creator. That appeal is at once answered by the delicate clarinet. It sheds its mellow lights, it repeats and lingers caressingly on one note, while it floods the nether worlds with sympathy and fuses into one with the flutes, which are now soaring in the Beatitudes.

"Again the benediction of God in the solitudes holds realm. The Purified-Human is being carried up—the utter annihilation, evaporation of Being is achieved. The orchestra has ceased, there is a long pause—we are facing God!

"Oh, Vieuxtemps, great poet, this is what the opening of the 'Quatrieme' means to me. It is after this introduction that I tremble at the thought of my worthlessness in taking up the 'Word'—in coming through space and eternities, bearing a silken thread of Light from the Sun, of Life, frail and timorous. How wonderful of you to have left us that grand Pause in the 'World's Symphony,' so we may devoutly look up for the power and get the Divine touch—that we may revently take up the skein and weave on, in the marvels of your creation!"

Chicago Opera—Believing that the new opera by Serge Prokofieff, "The Love of Three Oranges," will prove a sensation, the Chicago Opera Association is determined to do everything possible to make it a success. Announcement is now made that Boris Anisfeld, the famous Russian painter, is to provide the scenery and costumes, and Adolf Bolm, who first came to this country with the Diaghileff ballet, is to look after the stage management. These three Russians are in constant communication and believe that this production will prove, artistically and scenically, one of the greatest operas ever performed.

who filled this office on Thursday, exercised his prerogative in liberal fashion, and while we agree with his decisions in almost all cases, we yet claim the same privilege of outspokenness which he used, in our comment both on him and on the event in general.

An Eisteddfod, then, is certainly an exhilarating and an educational thing. Much care is, supposedly, expended in preparation for the event and much good is obtained from the critical comments of the adjudicator.

The prize winners, of course, feel very much elated over their successes, and the losers soon forget their disappointments; but all must be done with absolute impartiality, and in the case of the adjudication of the duet for soprano and alto, "O Lovely Night" ("Tales of Hoffman"), this writer does not feel that this was done at this time.

This is not alone because the prize winners were from Van Wert (the home town of the adjudicator), nor yet that the prize was not given to one of the two ensembles from Chicago (which unquestionably were composed of better voices than those of the Van Wert girls), but our resentment is aroused by the fact of the fulsome praise heaped by the adjudicator on these Ohio singers and the very unnecessarily severe strictures on the singers from Chicago.

To my mind, the singing was an almost exact "tie" in the case of the three ensembles, and if the adjudicator found it well to give the prize to Van Wert he should, at the same time, have awarded Chicago the praise due for the excellent work which was most certainly shown.

The mixed quartet singing of some sacred songs was interesting, and the competition for sacred solo, baritone or contralto, was particularly so in view of the fact that it brought to notice "Lonesome," a song by Homer Rodeheaver, which, while not sacred, is yet a gem of sentiment and expressiveness and well worthy of place.

The competitors on "In Italy," by Jeanne Boyd, should all have been ruled out at the preliminary tests, for not one of them had any idea whatever as to the proper rendition of this remarkable song.

The ladies' trio, "Sing, Smile, Slumber" (Gounod), was done beautifully by the winning ensemble, and the tenor competition was, taken all around, the finest of the afternoon inasmuch as each of the four singers disclosed unusually good voice and beautiful style.

But again we must disagree with the adjudicator when he declared that the three who competed in the chosen work for piano solo "were all fine."

The piece used was "Etencelles" of Moszkowski, and it was entirely beyond the ability of each of the three girls who played it.

They all used notes; one of them came to a complete stop each time she turned a page (imagine that is "Sparks"); there were glaring inaccuracies in reading, abominable transgressions from the laws of accent, phrase and rhythm, and altogether mediocre work.

Let the Chicago schools take note of the next contest at Winona Lake, and if any one of them will send down any one of its advanced piano pupils to compete, there can be no question as to results.

But in the matter of voice contests, they would find much stiffer opponents, for those Welsh musicians from Van Wert, Lima, Venedocia, Gomer, Warsaw and Winona certainly have good voices, and most surely they know how to sing.

On account of the very bad railroad schedule between Chicago and Winona it was impossible for me to remain for the evening contests, important though they were.

Herewith is found a complete list of the prize winners, both afternoon and evening:

Mixed Quartet—Singers from Venedocia, Ohio.

Mezzo-Soprano—(1) Mrs. Bessie Smith, (2) Lorene Hoover, Winona Lake, Ind.

AT THE WHITNEY TEW STUDIOS

The feature of the Sunday recital at the Tew Studio this week was "The Persian Garden," and it was indeed a delightful treat.

The singers were Mme. Genevra Alcott, Mme. Colbran-Melius, John Jaeger and Mr. Tew.

Liza Lehmann has done much in her musical setting to mitigate the moroseness of the Omar Khayyam verses, and yet there remains an undercurent of unhealthful pessimism and sentimentality that is depressing.

When, however, the beautiful Lehmann music is sung so well as at this time, this general effect of the morbid text can be, at times, forgotten, and always there is a keen delight in the artistic features of the work when presented so admirably.

In order to illustrate his thought of long scale for every singer, Mr. Tew had the two women singers alternate in the alto and soprano assignments of the score, i. e., both Mme. Melius and Mme. Alcott sang both alto and soprano solos.

The effect was unusual, not to say startling, and it was a complete exposition of very great voice powers and quality on the part of both singers.

Mme. Melius was best, unquestionably, in the alto solo, "The Worldly Hope," in which she produced very full and equally musical tone, but she also during the performance took some extremely high tones with great facility.

Mme. Alcott had to do the very high tones in the solo, "I Sent My Soul," and also in the "Lion and the Lizard" quartet, and she did them in a thoroughly thrilling manner, but also she sang some of the alto recitative with very great purity and fine musical charm, and altogether proved herself as she has often done before, a young artist of great ability and great intelligence, as well as the possessor of a remarkable voice.

Mr. Jaeger sang the two difficult solos (tenor), "Alas That Spring" and "Oh Moon of My Delight," with great purity of tone and the finest sort of musical intelligence, and in all the concerted numbers proved his voice capacity as well as his musical feeling.

Mr. Tew, the possessor of a voice of the rarest sort of quality, and low beyond telling, almost, has wonderful breath control and the ability to manipulate his tones in a way which makes his singing very unusual.

His work on "Myself When Young" was remarkable from every standpoint, and brought a ready response from the audience, many of whom had not before heard him, for, in all the musicales given at his studio, he himself very rarely indeed takes part.

The program in its entirety read as follows:

O My Heart Is Weary (Nadeschda)....Goring Thomas
Mme. Colbran-Melius

The accompaniments were, as usual, done in brilliant and artistic manner by Harriet Cartwright and Lucy Levy. Mr. Tew is distinctly fortunate in having two such experienced and resourceful assistants-at-the piano.

GRINNELL COLLEGE STRING QUARTET

Since its founding in 1907 the Grinnell College String Quartet has made but two changes in its membership—three of the players, David E. Peck, A. B., first violin; Mrs. Bertha Shutts Smiley, B. Mus., viola, and George L. Pierce, B. Mus., cello, being members of the School of Music faculty, and George White, A. B., 1912, and Miss Grace Seary, B. Mus., 1919, who have played the second violin position, being students of the college.

During so long a period of musical identity the quartet has been able to grow into that beauty of tone and ensemble which is the test of chamber music, and its success, attested by the increasing demand for its music in public, comes as a reward to the devotion and sincerity of the performers. Upon invitation of the Society of Music Teachers of Iowa the quartet has appeared twice at its conventions, and during the war over sixty programs were given at Camp Dodge.

The repertoire of the Quartet includes the classic works of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven as well as the works of many modern composers, such as Dvorak, Gretchaninow, Grieg and Debussy.

When the Flonzalays appeared at Grinnell in 1911, they found an audience eager to hear their music and obtained a return engagement for the following year. The Zoellner String Quartette has played at three different times in Grinnell, and Barrere has brought both his Trio de Lutece and his Ensemble. The keen interest in chamber music at Grinnell which these engagements reveal has been aroused and maintained chiefly by the work of the Grinnell String Quartette.

Votichenko—Mrs. Sascha Votichenko, wife of the Russian composer and virtuoso of the tympanon, is a tall, stately American girl of Italian descent, who has done much to promote the interests of her distinguished husband, both here and abroad. Her domestic instincts are expressed in their inviting studio in the Hotel des Artistes, where an atmosphere of comfort and hospitality always prevails and where many gifts of the world's greatest musicians inject the atmosphere so inseparably associated with the artistic temperament. In speaking of her 100 per cent efficiency, Mr. Votichenko said: "She builds for me an edifice of my art; she surrounds me with beauty and quiet; she sees to it that I am not pestered; in fact, without her I would not be!" Baby Taras Alexandrovitch Votichenko speaks many languages, but is master of none, although Italian is the language of his choice. At the age of two Taras won public approbation, when, dressed in a tiny kimono, he stood on the counter at Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt's booth at the Heroland Bazaar, selling kisses and smiles for a quarter and fifty cents apiece!

ELIAS BREESKIN MAKING RECORDS

Elias Breeskin, who returned to New York from Blue Hill, Me., for his appearance at the Stadium concerts on August 1, had planned to return north for the balance of the Summer, but has been forced to remain in the city owing to his engagement to make phonograph records for the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company. His first recordings have come out so remarkably well that the company is desirous of having at least six of them in the new catalogue which will be issued in the Fall; consequently Mr. Breeskin's vacation time has been curtailed. His first New York engagement of the season will be at Carnegie Hall on October 26, when he plays in a concert given for the benefit of the United American War Veterans. He will also be heard under the same auspices at the Metropolitan Opera House, Philadelphia, on November 8.

THE PRESS AT LARGE

In this division of Music News there will be printed, week by week, comments on various concerts and artists which have appeared in the daily and weekly press of the country. This is done in the belief that this matter will be found to be of great interest to a large number of people. This is in no sense an advertising department, and no items will be accepted for pay

Ganz vs. Ganz

Perhaps the funniest of all predicaments ever confronting any artist on tour was that of Rudolph Ganz in his attempt to disconnect with other celebrities of the same name. While out west, playing a concert with a Mr. Herman, a violinist, he was astounded to read "Jos. Ganz boxes Willie Herman at the ——— theater." The colored pugilist and the other fighter were scheduled for a bout on the same day as the Ganz-Herman concert, and the newspaper had mixed the two headquarters, announcing the concert at the boxing Club and the bout at the hall! Picture the amazement of the two audiences. Matters were patched up all right, and the pianist later called on the fighter to pay his compliments! Once before in musical history a musician was mistaken for a pugilist. Sir Arthur Sullivan, composer of "The Mikado," "Patience," "Lost Chord," etc., was visiting America. "I was distinctly honored several times," said Sir Arthur. "I was greeted by a crowd of gentlemen, very peculiar, you know—and they said they wanted to welcome me, they liked my punch and bearing—'my what?' I asked. 'Why, the way you handed it to the Kid last night.' 'I don't understand,' I declared. 'Aren't you Sullivan?' asked the leading one. I nodded. 'John L. Sullivan?' and I don't know to this day who he is! But you should have heard them when I said I was Sir Arthur Sullivan, the composer."—New York Globe.

May Mukle Gives Successful London Recital

On July Fourth May Mukle gave a cello recital at Aeolian Hall, London, and won the most enthusiastic reviews from the London press. Miss Mukle is returning to America for fall and winter engagements, but will have to return to England directly after her New York recital on January 26, as she has been engaged to appear with the Scottish Orchestra (Landon Ronald conducting) in Glasgow and Edinboro on February 7 and 9. Appended are the notices of her recital.

Latterly returned from America, Miss May Mukle gave a violoncello recital at Aeolian Hall last night, at which she showed once again what a fine player she is. The program, in its avoidance of the hackneyed, was admirable and presented a varied choice of music. Miss Mukle commenced with a concertino, arranged from a Sonata by Ariesto, which was beautifully played. A Hebrew Rhapsody which followed was performed for the first time here and proved very effective as regards opportunities for the display of Miss Mukle's fine tone and technical abilities.—Morning Post, July 5.

It was a great pleasure again to hear the violoncello playing of Miss May Mukle, who made a welcome reappearance in Aeolian Hall after a lengthy sojourn in America. That her playing has developed during her absence from England there is no manner of doubt. Her technic is as sure as ever, but it seems larger and the tone rounder than before, while there is an even more flexible bow-arm. Chief among several interesting works played was a Hebrew Rhapsody by a composer, presumably American, named Bloch. Here are to be found ample opportunities for technical display; but they are only the means to the end of expressing an idea in the nearest approach to what we call the Oriental scale that has been heard in a London concert room. Then there were some charming pieces by F. Warren, a young musician who fell in the war, pieces light as air if you like but full of music, as, indeed, were two dainty Fancies by Miss Mukle herself. It is regrettable that Miss Mukle is returning shortly to America, for we sadly wish to retain here native players of her calibre.—Morning Telegraph, July 5.

In choosing the program of her violoncello recital at the Aeolian Hall on Friday night Miss May Mukle relied not only on her admittedly excellent technical and interpretative gifts, although these would have been enough in themselves to justify her reappearance on the platform. Accompanied by her sister, Miss Anne Mukle, Miss May Mukle played all those numbers with equal skill and conviction and won the warmest approval from her audience—Sunday Times, July 6.

Alice Gentle as Carmen Wins Fresh Praise

The Chicago critics who brought out columns of superlatives on the occasion of Alice Gentle's portrayal of Santuzza at Ravinia Park have come out equally strongly for her Carmen, as may be seen by the appended notices:

Miss Gentle is a Carmen worth going a long way to see, one that asks no odds of her predecessors, many though they are, and is not particularly imitative of any of them. She has her share and more of good looks, she has a real voice and she has brains and stage sense. Combining these in accurate proportions, she is able to create an illusion. In the card scene it was a great one, perhaps her finest moment of the evening.—Chicago Daily Journal (Edward C. Moore), August 4, 1919.

Well repaid for its trip to Ravinia Park last evening was the very large audience which attended the first performance this year of Bizet's "Carmen," for so excellent a presentation of this classic has not been equaled in former seasons at the park. Alice Gentle's interpretation of Carmen was more than merely traditional; it had some marks of individuality, and it was vocally an artistic achievement in almost the entire music allotted to her. She has dramatic warmth and a vocal control, so that her singing is colored to fit the mood as well as the text. She also gave the impersonation, that of a typically Spanish girl, temperamental as well as good looking.—Chicago Daily News, August 4, 1919 (Maurice Rosenfeld).

A new Carmen last night appeared at Ravinia Park in the person of Miss Alice Gentle, a prima donna of the first class and a great actress. The first act of the opera was not given, which eliminated Miss Gentle's chance of pleasing the public with one of the most popular "tunes" in musical literature, but she scored so in the three acts that were given that nobody complained. It was a Carmen such as the French would like—a subtle Carmen and yet sufficiently violent; in the fortune telling scene a terrified Carmen full of the superstition of her race; and all in all a wanton swayed by passion, with love and murder in her flashing eyes. In the last act she was superb.—Chicago Daily Tribune, August 4 (Lucy Calhoun).

Band in Irate Farewell

J. W. Farr Indignantly Tells Oak Park He Is Through—Appreciation Is Not Sufficient

"Good-by, Oak Park," is the theme of an irate farewell by Director J. W. Farr of the Second Infantry Band. Mr. Farr believes the public has not appreciated the band and has treated the militia musical organization in a shabby manner. He relates its history and speaks his lament and farewell as follows:

"The tag day to raise money for a series of concerts by the Second Regiment I. R. M. Band brought in $334. At a regular meeting August 12 the band decided that, as no arrangements could be made to give the concerts satisfactorily, the money raised should be given to Oak Park charities and that no further effort be made to fasten ourselves on a community that evidently does not want us. It was felt though that an explanation was due those friends who had helped us.

"If the thanks due and sincerely given them carries with it thanks, with a reverse English, to those whose indifference or hostility deprives Oak Park of a creditable organization—well, that too cannot be helped.

"To give concerts, a bandstand, lighting and seating facilities are necessary. We asked the board of trustees for a small appropriation, but it was referred to a committee and we heard no more of it. I was told the board had no power to appropriate money for that purpose.

"Money is spent in the schools to cultivate a taste for music, yet cannot be spent to gratify that taste; is spent on the theory of music and cannot be spent on the practical application of it. Unable to get even a platform to play on, we decided that as the only suitable place for public concerts, Scoville Park, was in itself somewhat of a natural amphitheater, we could get along by having a few lights strung out; but to our surprise we were informed that the park could not be used for that purpose at all. 'A crowd of people like that would damage the grass more than we could make good in weeks.'

"Somebody evidently thinks it is still a private park instead of a public park bought with the money of that same 'crowd of people.' From the band's point of view, it looks queer, as in helping along public, patriotic and religious movements we have played in that park perhaps a dozen times in the last two years.

"And when we start on comparisons: When the boys went away the band turned out every time when sufficient notice was given, yet when the boys came back and the band wanted to give them a welcome home we could not even get the use of the high school for an evening; yet the high school is used, and rightly so, for all sorts of meetings.

"Then, when a welcome home was at last put on, by those most qualified for that sort of thing, you know, the services of the band were asked for and given free, and then we had the pleasure of seeing the place of honor given to an outside band for whose services a good price was paid. It was only unlucky that the band engaged had in the past drawn away many of our men, due to the fact that they received pay for doing the same work that we did for nothing.

"The band has met for different purposes nearly a hundred and fifty times; they have turned out for nearly everything that they have been asked to and for everything they have been able to, right down to last Decoration Day when we had out a forty-piece band 'that any town should be proud of,' yet the Fourth of July is not long after Decoration Day, and while there were three or four band jobs in Oak Park on the Fourth we did not get a chance at any of them, except a belated nibble.

"The money involved in these instances makes little difference, as most of the members of the band have been doing for nothing work that they would not do for pay, but lack of appreciation eventually gets under the hide and we naturally say 'for these many favors shown many thanks; good-by!'"

MARIAN CORYELL

Marian Coryell, several of whose songs are on the forthcoming program at Lockport, will give up her New York studio, as she has accepted a position on the faculty of the Cornish School of Music at Seattle, Wash.

The Coryell songs are continually growing in popularity and the composer is in constant receipt of commendatory letters, of which the following is a sample:

My dear Miss Coryell:

I have used your "Springtime" and "Dreamlandway" in recitals and also in my studio. They seem to be favorites and to meet with continued approval.

I am decidedly fond of "Springtime" and find it as easy to sing as it is delightful.

ESTELLE L. PERSHING STUDIO NOTES

Sergt. William F. Clancy is expected home this coming week. Sergeant Clancy took a course in sociology at the A. E. F. University, Beaune, France. While overseas he sang in several cathedrals.

Mr. Paul Dougherty, baritone, sang the Offertory solo at Hiram Thomas Memorial Congregational Church Sunday, August 17.

Miss Redmond has been doing some excellent organ solo work in picture houses in Chicago and expects to do more this season. Her accompanying is of the par excellence order and she was in much demand by visiting artists for several seasons in Ashland before coming to Chicago, and frequently returns there for artist recitals.

Cole—Rossetter G. Cole's "Symphonic Prelude," which has been twice played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, was a prominent number on an orchestral program given at Columbia University, New York, on August 12, when it was heartily applauded by an audience of twenty-five hundred people. Other numbers on the program, directed by Walter Henry Hall, were by Massenet, Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, and Wagner.

Bloomington—Mrs. James Reeder presented her annual concert at the State Normal School recently.

Rodiger—Mildred Rodiger, contralto, is singing at the Edgewater Beach Hotel.

CHARLES ALBERT STEBBINS

In 1905, quite unobtrusively, there was placed on the market a composition for the organ. It was called a sketch, and some lines on its title page indicated the spirit infused into the notes. The silence of the deep words was in its elusive initial whispering chords. Then a plaintive melody as of Pan tuning his pipes, followed by echoing, far-off calls. Then the sound of jubilant shouts and dancing feet as a throng of elves and nymphs and fairies troop past, dashing across the sward, embodying the very riot of summer gladness and exuberance in their lissome figures and ringing tones. Their passage is fleet, but the brightness shimmers in a long chord which seeks to retain and lengthen the charm of the visitation. Again silence falls until Pan resumes his reedy song. Then he, too, disappears and the notes fade into the woodland stillnesses.

This is the "In Summer" of Charles A. Stebbins. It was seized upon avidly by organists everywhere and added to all permanent repertoires. And into every teaching studio it went as well. It appears perhaps more often than any one number in a year's chronicle of organ events.

The reason for the popularity of this product of a prophet in his own country is not far to seek. It was the very first example of organ music which was determinedly "different." It was a new voice speaking in a new way and doing it so simply and directly that it made instant appeal to both the learned and the unready. It cut loose from tradition without any quarrel, and gracefully made its own place on its own merits.

What has just been said is not to carry with it any hint that Mr. Stebbins is to be accredited by the bald fact alone that he composed "In Summer." It's a pretty good reason for musical being, but it may be assumed that he would like to be judged by his entire product rather than one item. Mr. Stebbins has not crowded his music on the market. But what has come along in the years has had the same strong marks of exquisite fancy, consummate brevity, swift unfolding and exacting search for the fit mode to express mood. Each work bears its poetic prelude to signify the meaning of the grouped notes. "At Twilight" dates 1910 for copyright. Its swing echoes to the last line of the quatrain "of swaying treetops in the garden of sleep." The gathering shadows fall until a star gleams overhead and sings its song of gratitude. The theme is embellished with flute echoes. The more solemn voices of the night intone their threnody. Then ensues the peaceful course of the night. "Oh, the Lilting Springtime" bubbles and dances effervescently. It is dedicated to Samuel Baldwin and its chief motive is formed by the musical letters in Mr. Baldwin's name. A second section has the stuff of which dreams are made in it, drifting off into a pastoral strain until the glee of the season once more asserts itself. "When Dusk Gathers Deep" carries an inscription to Harrison M. Wild. The registration for melody is rich, almost dark, in its inference, with an interlude of retrospect to lighten its repetition in a brighter key. "The Swan" draws its inspiration from the Tennyson poem, laying stress not so much on that agitating quality of sweetness with which we associate a swan's death song as on the effect upon the listener. Almost Debussy-like is its indifference to form and key, and the utterance runs from faint delicacy to the thunder of the full organ. At the very last are the characteristic chords which one has to associate with the composer's first work, so mystical, so fluent, so suggestive of longing, sighing and the search for the unattainable.

From the above comment it is to be deduced that Mr. Stebbins' writings carry poetry and fancy in their voices. In addition they show canny knowledge of what an organ can bring out, while no small merit attaches to the fact that they are well within the powers of a fair player. The better the organist the more effective the result, naturally, but they are lovely in themselves.

But if any idea gains ground that Mr. Stebbins, in himself, is not wholesomely human, it can be dismissed summarily, for his life has been so well mixed up with the hardware business that the poetic flavor keeps well in bounds. When it does come forth, it is sane and healthy. A happy combination is that where music and business join hands. Each helps the other. To meet him is to encounter a quiet gentleman whose graying hair suggests more years than he has and whose snapping black eyes and cool, calm voice have undeniable youth in their color and depth. He has a smooth face, laughing mouth, good square chin, and a lithe but compact figure, knows how to clothe it well, has a firm, hearty handclasp, with slim, sinewy fingers, looks you squarely in the eye and gives you honest measure as he smilingly but serenely sizes you up. If he talks a bit about himself, reluctantly, you learn that he loved music keenly as a boy, studied organ with the man who sets so many on the right path, Harrison Wild, harmony with another choice spirit, Hubbard W. Harris, as well as Adolf Weidig, and played an organ meanwhile. Finally, one day, when he couldn't keep it, he wrote his "Festival Piece" and "In Summer." The success helped him to see that he had something to say and perhaps owed it all round to try and say it. So he sidetracked the hardware business and went to New York to study with Dethier and Percy Goettschius. On arriving he sought Schirmer's music store, found the window filled with a display of "In Summer," and felt so much at home and welcome that he remained in Manhattan ten years, playing in Fourth Science Church happily much of the time.

A few years ago he found that nothing could replace Chicago in his affections, and with business acumen came back to where the musical center is to be. He plays for the First Church of Christ, is associated with the Aeolian Company, and is a new member of the Executive Committee of the A. G. O. and a good, all-around man to know, meet, admire and joy in.

ALL AMERICAN EXPOSITION

There will be no lack of music, classical, semi-classical and popular, at the All-American Exposition to be held at the Coliseum August 30 to September 14, inclusive.

Plans were discussed at a luncheon given in Parlor A at the Morrison Hotel on last Friday, attended by nearly 100 persons prominent in local musical circles. The principal theme for discussion was "Music as a Factor in Americanization."

On the exposition music committee musical trades, professions and educational schools will be represented.

A LETTER TO HAENSEL & JONES

I have been intending for the past several days to write you, letting you know how splendidly Mr. Reuter fulfilled his engagement with us, substituting as he did for Prokofieff and Leginska.

His sterling musicianship was everywhere manifest in his playing, and I have no hesitancy in saying that his recital here was one of the most delightful piano recitals given in Decatur during my five years of residence here.

We have no regrets now over the failure of either Leginska or Prokofiff to play for us.

SUMMER NOTES FROM NEW YORK

By JOSEPH DE VALDOR

You have been accustomed to see New York spelled in large type. The city is still on the map and I am still at my post, but music has its recess just now and there is practically little to comment upon.

The Stadium is still alive, but the capricious weather is marring the pleasure of those who love open-air concerts. Just now we crave for real air and for music in the wide-open, but rain, rain, and rain again drives pleasure seekers into the big auditorium of the Stadium. Music must be listened to when you are afforded all the comforts, and the gymnasium does provide you these, save for the necessary amount of air.

Carrara and Davis

You all know that Olga Carrara made good when she sang Aida in concert form on August 5 at the Stadium. The management was so elated over her success and about their own happy choice that a return engagement was the deserved recognition. I remember some types of the first "Aida" attendance, and at the repetition of August 15 the same ones reappeared to listen again to Carrara. How glorious did her voice sound! What a fresh organ lies in that delicate throat! When she sang "Ritorna vincitor" her expressive eyes brought every syllable to the heart. Your ears were filled by sounds which are rare nowadays. Every word was uttered with power; every note was produced with wonderful effect. The articulation was admirable, the phrasing was artistic; the voice stirred the listener.

The parts which were allotted to her were handled with supreme skill. She exhibited a schooling of which few singers can boast. Voice, voice, and voice is necessary, but you must know how to handle it if you are to be classed with the elect. This was Olga Carrara's second important appearance in a week, and by her work she will come to the fore more and more.

Put Ernest Davis to sing as often as possible and you will never find him overworked. He is like the French culinary expert who delights in the saying, "L'appetit vient en mangeant." The more he sings the more he likes singing, and the more you listen to him the more you will like him. How many tenors tremble before that aria, "Celeste Aida"! Flat and off pitch characterize the singing of many tenors, but Davis plunged into the aria like the wrestler in the arena who is sure of the victory. He sang it with true pitch, with splendid control and with powerful and resonant voice. He was at home in the duos and in the balance of his concerted numbers. Both Carrara and Davis shared a frantic outburst of applause.

Mr. Volpe conducted well, but his musicians did not always respond to his beat. The chorus could have done the same excellent work without William Tyroller, who led them. The other soloists, the contingent of August 5, did not come up to the work of their colleagues. So much the better for the others.

Nicolay Still in the Metropolis

Our confreres of the Musical Courier were somewhat hasty in dispatching our friend Nicolay to Chicago. Their news reports are claimed to be quite accurate. But on August 14 the writer still enjoyed the agreeable companionship of Nicolay in New York in spite of the fact that our contemporary dispatched him to Chicago on the 12th. In fact, his making of records will not enable him to leave the metropolis before August 22. The Wellington Hotel is the home of many artists, and its elevator was conveying me to an interview with one of them when I was attracted on the way by some beautiful singing. I stopped to listen and finally made bold to enter the studio of Constantin Nicolay, whence issued the pleasing voice.

The Greek basso invited me to listen to his pupil, whose happy name chances to be Melba Duff. She is a mezzo-soprano and sang delightfully "Connais tu le pays," from "Mignon." I can only say that when this young lady makes her first appearance she will conquer. And how happy friend Nicolay will be! Last year while in Chicago I heard this pupil sing, but what a wonderful progress since! Voice and schooling. In the former, Nature has been generous with young Melba, and in the latter matter Fortune certainly smiled on her, for if you know about Nicolay's artistry, his teaching is just as superb.

There is a young lady by the name of Ottilie Selick (spelled incorrectly, perhaps) whom we will hear next fall at Aeolian Hall. She is another star pupil of Nicolay. She came to him to study Santuzza, and I heard her go over the role. She surprised me. I hear that this young singer will follow her teacher to Chicago. She is willing to trust her voice to Mr. Nicolay, and I know he will work wonders with his expert teaching.

Olive Nevin

The Sewickley artist appeared at the Stadium concert on August 12 instead of the 15th, and this change of dates deprived me of the opportunity to hear a singer worthy of the Nevins. My apologies for not being able to comment, but I shall do so in the future. Her engagement with the organization is a sufficient proof of the public's inclinations. Her appearance proved that the management used wisdom in presenting a singer who is worthy of the name "artist."

Mario Salvini

I was so fortunate as to see Mario Salvini in his New York studio on one of the days he could spare from his Edgemere (L. I.) school and found him surrounded by a platoon of pupils.

He is very busy, and this grows out of his extremely successful teaching, which is more and more making him a factor in the metropolis.

John McGhie

Three Johns are popular in New York, and each one of them is a son of Erin—John McCormack, John O'Sullivan (also a tenor, now in Paris), and John McGhie, the conductor. The latter just returned from fresh conquests. He was at St. Louis, where he conducted the municipal operas, and he certainly pleased the skeptical Missourians. He showed them what he could do, and for once the East made good there. Isn't it wonderful to note the awakening of our artistic spirits? We have been accustomed to read about the "Vons," the "Des" and the others who fill the positions as conductors for our symphonic bodies. Time has gone when we Americans sneer at a "Mc" leading an orchestra. The name might not be as euphonic as that of Monsieur De —— or Von ——, or Maestro, but that matters little.

John McGhie is a good conductor, anyhow, and you might see yourself in trouble if you'd ask him to change his name. Last year he was a great factor in the revival of Gilbert & Sullivan operas at the Park Theater with the Society of American Singers. He conducted them with great love, denoting his fondness for the works. He was every evening at his desk, and how beautiful the G. & S. music sounded.

St. Louis heard of his fame and brought him to lead the Municipal Theater at Forest Park. From June 16 to July 26 McGhie shone through his sure beat and the expert knowledge of the same works conducted at the New York Park Theater.

He led the Symphony Orchestra of the Missouri city on July 27. He proved to be at home in other directions, for on this occasion he directed the "Mignon" overture (Thomas) and the American Fantasy (Victor Herbert). On the same program, with soloists, many composers were featured: Gounod, Leoncavallo, Mendelssohn, Verdi, Balfe, Offenbach, Paul Rodney, De Koven, Donizetti. Isn't this program a proof of McGhie's versatility?

Week of July 21 he was at the baton in a performance of "The Chimes of Normandy" (Planquette). The following week McGhie directed with his usual success in "Robin Hood" (De Koven), "Bohemian Girl" (Balfe), "El Capitan" (Sousa), "The Mikado," and "The Wizard of the Nile."

It would be rather unkind not to mention the successes attained by two of the cast—that young chap and splendid tenor, Craig Campbell, and the excellent basso, Charles Gallagher.

The municipal organization would have recorded a financial gain if not for the freakish Summer, which provided rain instead of sunshine. Well, that same calamity befell New York, too. But notwithstanding the inclement weather, only a small deficit was the result of nature's trick.

John McGhie is one substantial proof that America can procure good conductors.

When will we emancipate from the foreign orchestra leaders? When will America give its sons the tribute they deserve—recognition? We shall welcome again John McGhie for the season of 1919-20.

Grant Kimbell-Alma Wallace

Don't be misled. The title means only that two Chicagoans have moved to New York. Who doesn't know Kimbell; at least every Chicagoan can tell you about him. Grant Kimbell has changed his home. I met him on Broadway and he told me that he was in a hurry because an audition awaited him. I followed him and heard him sing. Well, he will win New York. On August 14 he sang at the funeral of Andrew Carnegie at Lenox, Mass.

Miss Wallace is an organist and a pianist, too. She has also decided to make her home in New York, and the metropolis really needs good accompanists. She was at the piano for Mr. Kimbell and Joseph Mandell, who both gave an audition. Miss Wallace played even better than my anticipation. She can read any song at sight. So we wish her great success.

John McCormack Immortalized in a Book of His Life

(Publishers, Small, Maynard & Co., Boston.)

You can hear John McCormack in the recital room. Every home, I believe, has at least one or two records of his, so if you don't go to the Hippodrome your phonograph will provide a substitute. Now he comes out with his own life story, printed by Small, Maynard & Co. of Boston. The book is transcribed by Pierre V. R. Key, the critic of the New York World. For a man of his age, John McCormack (he is 35) has accomplished wonders. What singer can boast of such popularity as John? How many singers have waited long years before they gained a name! The book, of some four hundred pages, tells you everything about the Irish tenor. The Covent Garden, the Manhattan Opera House, his war contributions, his Australian appearances with Melba, his love for America, are chapters which will interest readers. You will find reflections of life, opinions of his own about everyone who came in contact with him. And even his accompanist, Schneider, is not forgotten. In fact, he forgets none. It is fascinating reading, and it is written as beautifully as his songs sound in the great auditoriums. There are many interesting photos. A volume of his book should be in everybody's library. There are thirty-three chapters of topics, and all interesting. He or she who admires John McCormack couldn't afford to be without this book.

Gallo's Mammoth "Aida"

We have escaped the Bolshevik movement and no one fears that this regime will ever penetrate into our country. Still, on the evening of August 16, one had the impression that the Russian chaos had moved temporarily to Sheepshead Bay Speedway, near Coney Island. "Aida," the postponed performance of August 10, took place on this particular evening, and if you had seen the behavior of the crowd you would have easily agreed to my statement. People who purchased 50-cent seats arbitrarily occupied $3 seats. Those who bought reserved seats were unable to find a decent place. Wires were broken by the crowd. The gentler sex was disregarded by the ill-mannered East-siders. Walls of human bodies impeded the view of those behind. The masses indulged in shouting during the performance. One can describe the manner of the attendance as anarchic, chaotic and disorderly. The good element suffered by the inability of the management to provide ushers. Twenty thousand or more were present, and only six policemen to keep order! Imagine! It was an operatic performance and not a mass meeting of the inauguration of a new political regime. What would become of the decent element if it had to be overpowered by hordes of illiterate and ill-mannered crowds under the disguise of music lovers! Fortune Gallo, the impresario of the San Carlo, and Andres De Segurola, of the Metropolitan, ought to be congratulated for the ability of interesting over twenty thousand human beings to listen to an open-air "Aida." The occasion was a benefit soiree for the earthquake sufferers of Italy. Was it the patriotic response, the music of Verdi, or the soloists, which attracted this immense crowd?

And even the scenery didn't behave. Some of the cardboard "columns" fell, naturally in the pauses; otherwise it would have worked havoc with the hundreds of stage people. The organizers didn't spare any expense. The chorus consisted of some 150 voices, there was a ballet of some 50, an orchestra of some 90, supers in abundance, horses, elephants and all the oriental requisites. Some of the interpreters belonged to the first-rank artists, and the first in artistic and vocal honors was Riccardo Stracciari, who sang Amonasro in a faultless manner. Cyrena Van Gordon was the next best; her voice went far into the depths of the huge field. Her Amneris was excellent as far as the singing part was concerned. Manuel Salazar, the Cuban tenor, poured out his potential voice in the singing of Radames. He was certain of himself and histrionically adequate. Marie Rappold's voice is too thin for open air, too light for "Aida," and she sang often off pitch. Cervi, Rossini and De Biasi belong to the ninth-rate operatic singers. Marie Tiffany struggled hard with her vocal powers in the part of the priestess. That splendid conductor, Giorgio Polacco, directed the performance and the musicians with his accustomed skill and knowledge of the great leader. The scenery was a patched-up affair of cardboard, while the curtain was a dignified piece, of the boarding-house style. And fortunately we went by without rain.

San Carlo in New York

Charles Baker, business manager of the San Carlo Opera, informs me that the season of operas in New York will commence on Monday evening, September 8, at the Forty-Fourth Street Theater. Among the new forces, Vincent Ballester, the young but famous Spanish baritone, is engaged for the principal roles. His engagement will strengthen the reputation of the organization. Another newcomer will be De Gregorio, baritone. Otherwise Manual Salazar, tenor, and Ducena Mario, coloratura soprano, will again reappear with the company More details later.

Who Is Galli-Curci's Teacher?

Many of my readers have asked me to make this pertinent question, but I doubt whether I will be able to answer it.

Now, only the great diva can satisfy the inquisitive. Only three days before her debut in Chicago Madame Galli-Curci told me that she never had a teacher, and I am inclined to believe her. I can substantiate this statement by the notes printed in Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. If you like to have the proof of the pudding, look over page 1085 and you will find the following:

"She never studied singing with any teacher; nevertheless she acquired the marvelous vocal technic through a unique method of self-instruction."

This proves to conclusion that the great coloratura soprano has never been taught to sing and that no one laid the foundation of her great vocal art.

Where much confusion has been created is that certain individuals who chanced to contribute to her initial engagements have announced themselves as being the tutors of her singing.

One advertisement falls into my hands in which I note that a certain teacher who is more able to procure engagements than to teach the art of vocalization claims that he has given musical instructions to Madame Galli-Curci, and then her own brother-in-law made the same claim. Now we ask ourselves who is who? Meanwhile those who use her name benefit materially and attract a great number of pupils, but sooner or later they will realize the truth.

Welcome Tirindelli to the Metropolis

New York is famous for the great number of studios. Everybody seems to be infatuated with the great opportunities that the metropolis offers to an aspirant of fame.

New York has legitimate teachers in plenty and, like every great center of the universe, it shelters many mediocrities.

P. A. Tirindelli is the latest arrival, and he intends to establishes himself in New York with the purpose of assisting those whose ambition is to follow a musical career. We welcome him, for his name will not fail to attract the attention of musicians and artists.

Mr. Tirindelli knows more about the violin than most of the so-called celebrities. His knowledge of composition is the household matter of every earnest musician. Many of his works are published by the famous house, Ricordi. As a conductor he is just as efficient as he is in the other branches of music, and less and not least he is an expert operatic coach of high standing.

He was formerly the head of the Violin Department of the Cincinnati Conservatory for more than two decades, and his departure from that conservatory is a matter of regret to the officials and his pupils.

New York suffers of a chronic evil, and it is with no little regret that one is compelled to admit it. Unscrupulous and incapable teachers are heralding themselves by means of advertisements as being teachers of certain professionals who have never been instructed by them.

Mr. Tirindelli does not belong to this class of teachers. He has to his account legions of pupils, but his modesty forbids him to use the fanfares and the trumpets of the illegitimate teacher.

We welcome his arrival in New York, and we wish him the great success he deserves.

JOSEPH DE VALDOR.

Simplicity in Singing

A SERIES OF PRACTICAL ARTICLES

By ELIZABETH FORESMAN BAGG
(Copyright 1919 by Mary Elizabeth Bagg)

PART VIII

Interpretation and Phrasing

The great and important subject of Interpretation can only be handled in a superficial manner through the medium of the printed page. Success in this line depends equally, I should say, upon the knowledge of the teacher and upon the intelligence and temperament of the pupil. It is the High School course in the curriculum of the voice, just as voice placing, breath control and voice building form the grammar grades. Should we wish to carry the figure further we might say that the university course will be the experience which the young singer will get when she casts off her teachers and enters upon her singing career, for no good singer will deny that some of her most valuable lessons have been learned after she has gone out into the world to sing. Do not let us make the mistake of believing that merely because she is before the public a singer is through with her study.

Up to this time the pupil has sung as her teacher has told her to, has phrased thus and so, given this or that reading to the score, according to the ideas of her instructor, allowing, of course, something for her own individuality, but conforming largely to rule. Now she must begin to think for herself, and neither teacher nor book can be her guide altogether. She must begin to create, to weigh this reading of a text against that one, to use her own judgment along the lines of interpretation, and according as she succeeds or fails in this will she be judged by her public.

We have spoken of the pupil's intelligence and temperament because they are the qualities which will determine her success as an artist. Both are necessary. The intelligence must act as a check upon the temperament, for temperament running riot is quite as disastrous as no temperament at all. It is like a young horse—that will only be valuable when he is broken to the bridle.

There has always been and will, I suppose, always be frantic discussion as to how deeply an artist should feel his own performance. Every actor and every singer has his theory upon the subject, many holding that the artist should preserve an absolute calm as far as his own emotions are concerned, playing upon those of his audience through sheer mentality. Others declare that unless the artist feels himself the emotions he is depicting he cannot expect his audience to feel them.

To my mind, the truth lies somewhere between the two points of view. It seems to me that in any interpretative art there must be on the part of the performer some temperamental disturbance, some stirring of the blood, some emotional quickening which will bridge the distance between him and his audience and awake like feelings in them. But it also seems to me that unless this force is entirely under the control of the intelligence of the artist, his servant and not his master, he is as well off without it.

The wise artist perfects with his intelligence his idea or thought of the role he is to play, and then pours into it his temperament, which gives it life and force. As we dig irrigation ditches into which we turn the water, going ever in the same direction, so may an artist, once his mental concept has taken form, turn on the force of his temperament to give new life each time to his interpretation.

Personally, I do not believe it is possible to become a great singer unless one has been endowed by nature with temperament. I know, however, that it is quite possible to acquire or cultivate a something that will arrive at temperamental effects by means of imitation, at first, and intelligence later on, and which can produce a good singer. In other words, it is possible to make use of some of the means whereby temperament, aided by intelligence, achieves its effects in interpretation, such as quality of tone, phrasing, facial expression, etc., for he with the divine gift of temperament, with its accompanying forces, personality and magnetism, must use these means to an end, just as must he who by means of intelligence and perseverance only is doing his work.

It is hardly possible to illustrate the use of quality of tone or facial expression in cold print, but it is, of course, self-evident that the different tone colorings, the bright and the somber, the joyous and the sad, must be called into play to depict their corresponding emotions, while one would hardly smile while singing of death or sorrow, but would naturally throw life into the face and eyes at the thought of spring and the happiness of love.

Phrasing, too, is a method of interpretation. It can be considered in a broader aspect than merely that of singing—that is, in its relation to all the arts based upon rhythm—dancing, as well as music, and the spoken drama as well as the lyric. The skilled dancer phrases his dancing as truly as the pianist does his etude, while the actress uses this method to interpret the thought expressed in words, as surely as does the operatic singer in her arias. But, in its restricted relation to the art of singing, phrasing is much more than merely a place where a desperate singer snatches a much-needed breath. It is as well a potent means whereby one may express the most delicate shades of meaning—a sort of musical punctuation.

For instance, we do not always breathe at the end of a phrase. Nor do we phrase every time that we breathe. It is possible when necessary to seize the life saving breath without breaking the phrase. Occasionally, also, the sense of the passage demands that the end of the phrase shall come where it is not necessary to take breath. A phrase in literature is, according to Webster, a sentence—a brief expression. So also in music we find the length of the phrase determined by the thought which it expresses.

Good phrasing, then, in a song must be that which correctly gives forth the thought of the composer, as expressed in text and rhythm. This must be accomplished by the singer regardless of his limitations. For instance, in cases where the composer's conscience has not made him take these limitations as severely into consideration as he perhaps might have, the vocalist must fortify himself when and where he can with fugitive and unsuspected breaths, not breaking the phrase, and still giving nature that much-needed second wind.

Bad phrasing becomes noticeable when we hear these breaths, taken in illegitimate places, or where the meaning of the music is needlessly chopped to help out faulty breath control. Imagining the impossible, that a singer could so control his respiration as to be able to sing an entire song without taking breath, he would still phrase, just as the violinist, the pianist and the dancer do. One sees thus easily how phrasing which is sometimes spoken of as merely the art of knowing where to breathe has a bigger significance in its relation to interpretation.

ANNA CASE MAKES HER FIRST AEROPLANE FLIGHT

Anna Case, the well-known American soprano, made her first air flight Monday afternoon, August 11, when she was the only passenger with Major Sidney E. Parker, R. A. F., on the first leg of his flight from New York to New Orleans via Hudson River, the Great Lakes and the Mississippi in the Curtis flying boat, the Sea Gull.

Major Parker left Port Washington, L. I., Monday afternoon, picked up Miss Case in front of the Summer cottage at Namaroneck. Then the flight was made over the Long Island Sound down to New York, crossing to the Hudson near the Battery, descending in front of the Poughkeepsie Yacht Club at 5:45 p. m., when Miss Case and Major Parker went ashore for dinner. The unexpected arrival of the hydroplane at Poughkeepsie caused a great deal of excitement among the people at the club and on the shore and when a young woman was seen stepping out of the machine in an ordinary street dress the amazement knew no bounds. After dinner Miss Case left for New York on the 8:45 train and was safe and sound in her home before 12 o'clock, after the most exhilarating day she ever had had.

In speaking of the flight Miss Case said: "Well! it was just wonderful, just wonderful—afraid, no; not a bit of it. At any rate it came about in such a hurry that I had no time to think about fear. The original plan had been altered so I thought the flight was off for the present. Then suddenly the bicycle policeman came rushing down the lawn, shouting, 'There is a chap up in the air looking for you. He was down in front of the Yacht Club asking for you. I told him I would run up and tell you and fire my revolver so he would know where to come down.' In a few minutes more the plane was on the water a short distance from the shore. I hurried out in my canoe and climbed in, and up and on we went, down the Sound, across New York and up the Hudson, flying most of the time 2,000 feet up.

"It was simply glorious to see the great city, the Hudson, the Palisades from above. You hardly realized that you were way up in the air. The only trifling uncomfortable feeling is when the machine makes a turn. That gives a sensation, the first time, akin to seasickness. There was three in the plane, Major Parker, his mechanic and myself. The noise from the propeller was terrific and you cannot talk. If you want to say anything you write a note. I was dressed just as you see me now, with the addition of a flyer's cap."

"Will you go up again?" "I surely will if I have a chance."

CHARLES COURBOIN

John Wanamaker announces for the season of 1919-1920 a Cycle of Organ Music for the cities of New York and Philadelphia, on a scale not hitherto attempted, with Charles M. Courboin, the Belgian virtuoso organist, as honorary guest soloist. The organ in the New York Auditorium is being reconstructed for this purpose.

This is in line with the many years of musical activity of the Wanamaker Stores, and opens a new era as foreshadowed in the recent recital in Philadelphia, when the largest organ in the world was played by Mr. Courboin, in conjunction with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting.

Kimbell—Grant Kimbell, tenor, who lately moved from Chicago to New York, was chosen as one of the singers for the funeral of Andrew Carnegie at Lenox, Mass.

Landwer—Lillian Landwer, Chicago soprano, spent last week at Winona Lake, Ind.

PITTSBURGH
N. A. O. CONVENTION, AUGUST 5-8

Reported by LOUISE MORRIS

The convention weather which so furiously attended the opening of the twelfth annual convention of the National Association of Organists was quelled when, at the first meeting, the organists facetiously voted a "rain-stop." Just how this legislation was executed is a mystery, but, at any rate, good weather attended the remainder of the four-day session.

The Carnegie Institute, a combined museum, gallery, concert hall and library, well known to every art lover, was the scene of the convention and suggested that merging of art with music which has been so long coming and is still so far from being consummated. The lecture hall of the institute afforded a delightful place for discussional meetings, and the music hall, with its large Skinner organ, one of the finest in America, was used for most of the recitals.

"Sometimes one wonders," runs an editorial in the August Console, "just why this association holds together. Well, one of the reasons is this: While the critics are picking the thing to pieces there are a lot of good men and women, who play the organ more or less, having a good time getting together in an enjoyment of life. They eat together and indulge in a little looking over of each other. One sees that the great ones wear about the same sort of clothes that are worn back home," etc., etc.

And there you have the spirit of the N. A. O. convention. In a way it was quite an informal sort of thing, yet it was dignified by the presence of some of the biggest men in the country, musically speaking.

The convention began socially on the evening of August 5 with an address of welcome at the institute by its president. A reception at the Hospitality House, near by, also took place that evening, and not until 11 o'clock next morning did music receive prime consideration. At that time Frederick Schlieder (Church of St. Nicholas, New York) gave a paper on "How Bach Came to Be, and Why." This organist and theorist has an original point of view, and it is interesting to consider musical history with President Schleider. He is president, let me explain, of the N. A. O., and was re-elected on August 8, as were a majority of N. A. O. officers. More will be said of Mr. Schlieder later.

Wednesday Afternoon

The outline as given beforehand included the following topics for discussion:

1. Specific object of music in the church, and does it fulfill its mission?
2. Is there one denomination where music is most suited for the spiritual needs of the people?
3. Of these types of musical construction, which is most suitable for religious music — Gregorian, Polyphonic, Melodo-Harmonic, Modern?

The actual discussion, however, went far afield and ran something like this:

Dr. Mason (Illinois Wesleyan) defined the object of church music as UPLIFT, in which case, he asserted, the organist is just as important as the preacher. He suggested a bargain between preacher and organist, in which the organist says, "I'll behave myself in the choir loft if you'll behave yourself in the pulpit. I won't whisper or rattle papers during your sermon if you don't talk to the guest preacher during my prelude. My prelude is not a processional."

Dr. Maitland (Philadelphia) and Dr. Hemington (Chicago) rose to say that all musical numbers, whether artist numbers or preludes, should be incorporated in the service, with the pastor in his place and the congregation in an attitude of worship. The word PRELUDE, argued another, means something BEFORE the service; hence the word MEDITATION might be substituted (as is Woodman's practice) to carry the proper connotation.

Dr. Frank E. Morton threw the only real bomb of the afternoon when he stated that "church music has such an absolutely soporific effect on one that most business men cannot afford to go to church."

"It takes three days to recover," said Mr. Morton.

If the element of rhythm were present, somebody suggested, the effect on "T. B. M." be reversed, at any rate until the service was of such a nature that the business man could not afford not to come to church, the organ is not fulfilling its object of uplift.

And so this introspective discussion waged. ARE organists egotists? MUST organists believe in a given creed to play its service well?—and so on.

Charles Heinroth, who gave a recital late Wednesday afternoon, was enthusiastically applauded after each of his numbers. As municipal organist he has an important place in Pittsburgh and vicinity, but, more than that, he has justly won national fame.

The Heinroth program:

Sonata, the Ninety-Fourth Psalm	Reubke

Wednesday Evening

The valley in which the Carnegie Institute is situated is studded with numerous fine buildings and is said to represent more money than any other area of equal magnitude. One of the most imposing edifices in the group is St. Paul's Cathedral, at which the N. A. O. were guests on Wednesday evening. The male choir of St. Paul's had prepared a musical service consisting of (1) four Gregorian Chants, without organ accompaniment; (2) four examples of sixteenth century a Capella Style; (3) four Anthems in modern a Capella Style; (4) a Sanctus, an Offertory and a Credo, and (5) a group constituting the proper service for the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, which was performed at the close.

Thursday

The convention betook itself on Thursday morning to the Liberty Theater to hear Edwin Napier accompany "An Eye for an Eye" and "Shoulder Arms." In Mr. Napier we have an eminent exponent of the art of theater organ playing. For the Nazimova picture the playing was subjective, usually quiet. Few familiar themes were introduced, and the music was designed to keep the mind on the picture and not to attract attention to the organist. This is in good taste and most effective. In "Shoulder Arms" we heard the clever devices of Mr. Napier's registration synchronized miraculously with a rapidly moving film. His imitative work added to the fun and colored the story. A little glissando with the harp, or a little trilling on the pedals at the right time, and the audience shouted with merriment.

In the afternoon came a short discussion of a paper read by Henry S. Fry (Philadelphia) on the pertinent subject, "Modern French Organ Music," and after that a recital of a unique character given by President Frederick Schlieder.

"Improvising," says Mr. Schlieder, "is not so much a gift as an art. We would not think much of a person who could read aloud but never could converse. Just so, every musician should be conversant enough with harmony and musical construction that he could approach something like self-expression on the keyboard."

His first improvisation was a minor movement of the melodo-harmonic style, but for the second Mr. Schlieder allowed persons in the audience to call out notes, which he took down and used for a theme in the order given. Following is the theme:

F B C♯ E F G D♯

"All in the key of F," he said blithely, "just stretched a little." And he proceeded to make real music out of the impossible-sounding theme.

Two more improvisations were given, equally remarkable. One was a tender, beautiful passage built upon chords suggested; the other was a Fugue, with Prelude, on a theme sent up from somebody in the audience. His extraordinary powers of development were, of course, best shown in the Fugue.

Uselma Clarke Smith

Still another recital followed, namely, some good numbers by Uselma Clarke Smith (Philadelphia). The program was as follows:

Marche Pontificale (First Symphony).....Charles M. Wilder
Moderato Cantabile (Eighth Symphony).....Charles M. Wilder
Prelude and Fugue in A Minor.....J. S. Bach
Novelette, Opus 68.....Horatio Parker
Scherzo Pastorale.....Uselma Clarke Smith

Thursday Evening

The following excellently varied program was performed by Edwin Arthur Kraft, F. A. G. O. (Cleveland):

Marche Triomphale.....Gustav P. Hagg
Serenade.....Sergei V. Rachmaninoff
Barcarolle.....Anthony S. Arensky
Allegro Gioioso.....Gaston M. Dethier

Organ Builders

A fortunate feature of the convention was the simultaneous conference of organ builders, which took place in the same building. Friday morning was set apart for discussion of mutual problems and interests, Mr. S. L. Gruenstein presiding. The speakers included Clifford Demerest, who presented some interesting facts and suggestions, largely relative to standardized consoles. The genial Ernest M. Skinner, representing the organ builders, urged the organists to exert their prerogatives and work for their own betterment. He refuted the statement that organists are egotists.

Frank E. Morton

As Mr. Morton is, among other things, acoustical engineer of the American Steel and Wire Company, his thoughts on music were heard with keen interest. His paper deserves publication, but a few jottings will suffice here. His subject was "The Responsibilities of the Organist." The performer's selection determines the output of the composers, largely, and Mr. Morton urged that music be brought back into nearness to everyday activities, where its ancient commendation lay. The pastoral, the plantation melody, the spinning song, the songs of miller, forge and ship, are passing with the era of the individual. Work songs for the present day do not exist. Our songs exalt not labor, but leisure, sensuality and travel. Science as science has had its day and turned into utilitarian channels, and music, if it disdains to link itself with industry, will be the loser.

A few examples of the use of music in army and industrial groups were given by both Mr. Morton and Mr. Sammonds, who followed. Mr. Morton offered to be the medium for a compilation of organists' experiences in tone significance and musical therapy. The organist, he says, knows tone composition better than anybody else.

Robert Lawrence, whom Dr. Hemington (presiding) then introduced, talked on neighborhood singing as he introduced it in New York. He flashed on the screen various songs and pictures which he uses on a sheet stretched across New York streets. Twenty-three centers there now have weekly sings, preceded by games and relays.

Sidney C. Durst in Spanish Recital

Sidney C. Durst, F. A. G. O. (Cincinnati), gave a unique recital on Friday afternoon. His program was interesting in the extreme and well performed, although from the nature of it no great contrasts were possible. The Spanish composers quoted from are all living, save the first two, Elias and Cabezon, and all have done their work without external influence or intercourse:

Prelude and Fugue.....Elias
Diferencias (Variations).....Cabezon
Postludio.....Manzanares
Plegaria.....Torres
Comunion.....Torres
Andante.....Beobide
Final.....Beobide
Preludio.....Turina
Interludio.....Arabaolaza
Adagio.....Otano
Interludio.....Giuridi
Ofertorio Sinfonico.....Serracant
Comunion.....Urteaga
Plegaria.....Urteaga
Salida.....Urteaga

Hugo Goodwin

Hugo Goodwin gave a characteristically splendid recital on the last evening of the convention, the more remarkable for his having spent the most of the day in a hospital with a dislocation of the jaw. His program was cut down somewhat to include only the numbers listed below, and was supplemented by three numbers played ex tempore by Rollo Maitland (Philadelphia). These numbers were "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, a Bach Prelude in B minor (Bk. 2, No. 10, of Peters), and, lastly, Dethier's "Brook."

Mr. Goodwin's program, played (as was Mr. Maitland's) from memory, was as follows:

Gothic Symphony.....Widor
Allegro
Andante Cantabile
Dance of the Odaliquee.....Rebikoff
Toccata in E.....DeMerean
Heroic Piece.....Franck
Rigaudon from Dardanus.....Rameau
Told by the Camp-Fire.....Goodwin
Adagio in B Flat.....Pleyel
Symphonic Scherzo.....Goodwin
Second Legend.....Bonnet
Cortege.....Debussy

A LETTER FROM FRANCE

Chabris, France, July 11, 1919.

Music News: It is strange the unexpected way in which you meet people here. Several days before leaving Brest I suddenly ran into Sascha Culbertson, the violinist, in one of the streets. The last time I had seen and spoken to him was at Pisek, Bohemia, in 1911, when studying with Professor Sevcik. The Sevcik pupils who may by chance read this letter will remember Sascha Culbertson as one of the most brilliant violinists of Professor Sevcik since the days of Kubelik. He has played with flying colors in every great musical center of Europe, and is one of those who has shed additional luster upon the undying fame of the Bohemian master. He is now, too, playing for the American boys in France, and is doing splendid work. I was glad indeed to discover that so splendid and great an artist should be playing for the soldier boys and wearing the insignia of the "Triangle." I paid him a visit in his room at the Hotel des Voyageurs, and tried out his violin. He is not now using the magnificent Guarnerius which he had at Pisek, but is using instead a violin of Swiss make, and I can't blame him for not taking any chances. He later on repaid my visit by calling on me at my hotel. For more than an hour we played for each other on my violins and discussed old times at Pisek. From him I learned that Professor Sevoik is now in Prague, and Kubelik and Kocian are also in Bohemia, besides a lot of interesting information concerning some of the other pupils who were there during our time. It was certainly a happy meeting and brought back to me once more very forcibly those never-to-be-forgotten days spent in the very heart of Bohemia—then a vassal state under the German-Austrian tyranny, but now a new, reborn republic—Czecho-Slovakia! It brought back to me again the inspiration and glorious history of the school founded by the illustrious Bohemian master Sevcik, and the finest and purest tradition in the realm of violinistic technique and literature for which his name stands.

We were sorry to leave Brest, for in spite of its sinister reputation with the majority of our soldiers who went through there during the time the war was on, our four weeks spent there were replete with many pleasant recollections. We visited the French navy yard and saw five of the German submarines. We made a trip by launch across the bay to Fort Lanveoc, perched on a high and steep rock, and there that sunny Sunday afternoon, right in the shadow of one of the huge guns, Miss Browne sang and Miss Tris played on a portable organ for a company of our boys stationed there in charge of some German prisoners. It was all in the open in the grass and wild flowers, with a splendid birdseye view of the bay and country beyond. And last, but not least, was a splendid fifteen-mile "hike" to the village of St. Trinite, and from there to the shore of the bay and then along a charming foot path skirting the very edge of the high, rocky bluffs to St. Anne. From there one follows the military road along the bay to Brest, constantly enjoying a beautiful panoramic view of the harbor and city of Brest. This latter trip, however, is naturally only for those who are seasoned walkers. Besides, there were those charming trips by auto truck under the auspices of the "Y" into the interior of Finistere Province. I described one of them some time ago. Each one of those excursions, however, would make a fertile topic for anybody with literary inclinations.

We left Brest Monday evening, June 16, for Paris. Not many miles out of Brest we were held up more than five hours by a derailed car ahead of us. Ours was a so-called military train—American—carrying only soldiers and sailors and others connected with the service. There were about 150 sailors with several of their officers on board from the U. S. S. Seattle, going to Paris on a three days' furlough, besides soldiers. The long delay put the sailors particularly in an ugly humor, and during the entire night they behaved in a reckless, rowdy and boisterous manner. In fact, I was thoroughly ashamed of them. But punishment swift and terrible was coming. Early the next morning one of the sailors very foolhardily climbed on top of one of the passenger coaches, riding that way until the train passed under a low bridge, when he was struck and instantly killed. The naval special police officer in charge was beastly drunk, and had he been sober the sailor probably never could have succeeded in getting to the roof of the car. Besides there were several other naval officers aboard the train, and yet the men were not restrained. Ah, such poor discipline! Here was a boy, a moment ago hale and hearty and in his prime, and his life is snuffed out and literally wasted for no good cause whatsoever on a sight-seeing trip to Paris. Somewhere in the States, perhaps, a mother, a father, a sister or other dear ones will be advised that their boy "died by accident" and will be thrown into mourning and it will be well for them if they will never learn of the utterly useless way in which his life was wasted.

This thoroughly sobered the sailors, and, in fact, it threw a gloom over everybody on the train. It helped to delay us still more, so that we arrived in Paris Tuesday afternoon fully eight hours late.

So, you see, not a day passes by but is filled with action and excitement. Some of the experiences are very pleasant; others again the very reverse, as you can see for yourself. But in spite of all hardships not one of us would be willing to have forgone the trip, nor do we for a minute regret ever having come.

We stayed a day at Paris and were sent to the Intermediate Section for a three weeks' tour. Our first stop was at Nevers, where we gave three concerts, including also the camp at Verneuil, thirty-two miles away, going there and back by auto. From there we went by rail to Montierchaume, a great salvage center, giving two concerts there. Then to Bourges for ten days, giving daily concerts. And here again we literally had to tear ourselves away, for it would have taken but little more influence on the part of Mr. Callahan, the congenial K. of C. secretary, and Father Barrett, the lovable old chaplain of the American Hospital, where we played, to have made us overstay our leave and become "A. W. O. L." Really I often wonder which is the greater of the two—the fine pleasure of meeting so many nice people or the poignant pain of tearing yourself away from them.

From Bourges we went to Gievres, a great engineering and supply camp, to play for about eight days. We are staying at an adjacent village called Chabris, about five or six kilometers from the camp. The camp itself is one of the largest in France, covering an approximate area of forty square miles. Another pleasant experience was mine here. In playing at one of the "Y" huts here the secretary advised me that there were a few Czecho-Slovak soldiers in the audience, and requested me to say a few words to them in Bohemian. In fact, it was a very cosmopolitan audience, consisting of our own American boys, French poilus, Poles and the few Czechs mentioned. Of course, I was delighted to speak a word of welcome to my Bohemian compatriots in the native tongue. After the concert the small group of Czecho-Slovak soldiers forced their way to the stage, stopped in front of me, brought their heels together and saluted in military style. Alas, our time was short; far too short, for the wonderful visit I had with these men. One of them had just a few weeks ago arrived from Siberia, where he had gone through that Czecho-Slovak campaign, first against the Austrians and then against the Bolsheviki, which has very aptly been called "the modern Anabasis" of the Bohemian nation. All of them had deserted from the detested Austrian army in order to fight under their own colors with the allies and had been now in the field, seeing the hardest service, for nearly five years! It is in moments like these that we realize the true significance of this war and the greatness of the days in which we are living. I understand there are about 300 Czecho-Slovaks here in Gievres under their own command, and we have been asked to give a special concert for them if the matter can be arranged.
